"Do not give way to your fears," I shouted in her ear, the only way I could now make my words distinguishable above the awful roar; "the storm is doubtless at its height and will soon abate."

She grasped my hand nervously, but made no reply. Some time after this my friend, Mr. Palmer, came hurrying into the apartment, his pale face and quivering lips clearly expressing his fears.

"This is terrible!" he exclaimed; "terrible! Already the house rocks, and I fear it will soon be down with a crash, burying us under its ruins!"

He was immediately followed by his wife, leading two children, boys of seven and ten. She tottered to her seat, sank down, and began to cry and wring her hands, the children screaming in terror and clinging to her for protection. Clara now got up, staggered forward, and threw her arms around her neck. The next minute the eldest-born, a lad of seventeen, accompanied by his sister, two years younger, rushed into the apartment, and the girl, with a loud cry, immediately ran to her mother, knelt down by her side, and buried her face in her lap. It was a pitiful sight, that group of five—four clinging to one, as if to their only hope, in that dreadful hour, and she herself as helpless as an infant!

During the next quarter of an hour the servants, to the number of ten, all negroes, made their appearance, some crying, and all looking as if they feared their last minute had come. All drew together for sympathy, and all met there, in that time of tribulation, as equals before God. With a horrible death staring all alike in the face, how little is thought of the distinctions of race or color! Who, with a dread eternity opening before him, dare claim superiority over his fellow-worms of the dust?

Still the wind increased in fury, and the house trembled and shook in the most frightful manner. Suddenly the western wall came in upon us with a crash, the ceiling came down in fragments, the light was instantly extinguished, the wind swept over and around us with an awful power, and whirled us about among the ruins as a child might have knocked about its toys.

No description can do justice to such a scene, and imagination itself must fall far short of the horrible calamity.

For myself, I had been hurled back into one corner, and I found a human body resting heavily upon me. I heard wild shrieks, thought of Clara, and attempted to rise. At that moment a flash of lightning showed me it was a negro who had fallen upon me; and putting my hand to his head I made the awful discovery that a part of it was gone!—having, as I afterwards conjectured, been carried away by a falling beam. The man was dead, and probably never knew what hurt him. As soon as I could I got out from under him; but the wind blew with such violence that I could not keep my feet, and was obliged to move about on my hands and knees. I had been considerably bruised, but was not seriously hurt, and I now endeavored to find Clara, and render what assistance I could to the living.

The rain was falling in torrents, and against this we had no protection, for the whole house was a mass of ruins. Only by the frequent flashes of lightning could we see anything, for during the intervals the darkness was impenetrable. I succeeded in reaching the group I have mentioned as clinging together, and found Mrs. Palmer, three of her children, and Clara, surrounded by, I may say wedged in among fragments of timber, but all living, and only injured by bruises no worse than my own. Their escape from instant death—all of them—seemed little less than a miracle. Fearing there might be no safer place than where they were, I advised them to remain there for the time; but as Mrs. Palmer was nearly distracted about her husband and son, who had not been seen or heard from since the fall of the building, I continued my explorations among the debris as well as I could, being in constant danger from the shifting fragments, and seeing only by the lightning's glare.

Throughout that long, terrible night, the wind increased in fury till near morning, and it is surprising that any life was preserved. I did not succeed in finding those I sought, but I discovered two more dead bodies of the blacks, and two others seriously wounded, to whom I could render no assistance whatever. I also came upon two others—female servants—who were crouching down together, and did not appear to be injured, but who were so stupified with fear, that I could get no intelligent answer from them.

In attempting to return to Mrs. Palmer and Clara, as I was clambering over a pile of rubbish, the wind suddenly caught me up from the ground, whirled me round and round, carried me a distance of over two hundred yards, and then deposited me as gently on the earth as I could have put down a child. I was so completely bewildered, though, that for a long time I lay there without making any effort to return to the demolished dwelling; and when I did at length attempt to get back by crawling on my hands and knees, for it was impossible for any human being to stand upright, I lost my way, and remained in the fields till morning.

When daylight came at last, it was only to make visible the horrors of that appalling night. Look where you might, the eye rested upon nothing but the most dire destruction—houses in ruins, trees prostrated, fences swept away, and fields as completely ruined as if a fire had passed over them. In every direction cattle lay dead or dying, dead birds were here and there piled up in heaps, trunks of trees, limbs, stakes and splinters, were everywhere projecting from the earth, into which they had been deeply driven by the force of the wind, and over all that late beautiful island desolation now reigned supreme.

By this time the fury of the tornado had begun to abate; but the wind still blew so fiercely that, in spite of my utmost exertions, it took me a whole hour to get back to the ruins from which I had been so swiftly removed. There the sight that met my eyes beggars description. Mrs. Palmer, Clara, and the children were still together where I had left them, but the eldest daughter had been killed by a flying stick of timber striking her on the head, and the others were found nearly distracted. Mr. Palmer was found under a pile of rubbish, with a broken leg, and his son lay within a few feet of him, with a splinter of a tree, supposed to have been riven by lightning, driven completely through his body. Let me draw a veil over the awful, heartrending scene, which even now I can only recall with a shudder of horror.

What I have so feebly described as happening at the house of my friend, is only a faint picture of the ruin, destruction and desolation which entirely extended over the devoted island. By eight o'clock in the morning the late furious air had become perfectly still, and the bright, hot sun was shining calmly down upon a broad scene of death and woe.

And then, everywhere throughout the island, it was friend seeking friend, parents their children, children their parents, husbands and wives one another—for, amid the wild fury of the tempest, thousands of persons had become separated—in too many cases, alas! never to meet again in life. All were pale, horrified, despairing, and neighbor could not give his aid and sympathy to neighbor, because of the calamity which had equally come upon himself. Each family, so to speak, had alone to care for its sick and wounded, dig out and bury its dead; and in some cases whole households lay crushed beneath their own ruins for days, and corpses and carcasses everywhere sent forth pestilential effluvia, so that many in health sickened and died, while of those seriously wounded scarcely one escaped fever, lockjaw and mortification.

Of the eighteen persons, white and black, in the dwelling of my friend on that awful night, nine perished within forty-eight hours, Mr. Palmer himself making one of the fatal number.

Out of a population of one hundred thousand on the island seventeen hundred lost their lives; and the living, besides all their other horrors, were threatened with famine, for nearly everything in the way of food had been destroyed. Of corn from the fields, however, there were found heaps, where it had been collected by the wind, and this kept off starvation till provisions could be sent from the neighboring islands. England, when she heard of our great sorrows, quickly raised and sent us a hundred thousand pounds sterling.

Three months later, the houses everywhere had been rebuilt, new vegetation had taken the place of the old, and the whole island looked as bright and peaceful as before it had been made a a land of mourning and a howling waste.

Introduction of Tea.—That tea (says Dr. Lankester, in his "Popular Lectures on Food") was first brought into Europe from China there seems to be no doubt; but the exact date of that event is involved in some obscurity. By some writers, the first introduction of tea into Europe is claimed for the Portugese, who, as early as the year 1577, commenced a regular trade with China. Edmund Waller, in some complimentary lines to Catherine of Braganza, says:

"Venus her myrtle, Phœbus has his bays,
Tea both excels, which she vouchsafes to praise;
The best of queens and best of herbs we owe
To that bold nation, which the way did show
To the fair region where the sun doth rise,
Whose rich productions we so justly prize."

One of the earliest literary references to tea, in a European language, is found in the writings of Giovanni Pietri Maffei, who, in his "Historiæ Indicæ," says: "The inhabitants of China, like those of Japan, extract from a herb called chia a beverage, which they drink warm, and which is extremely wholesome, being a remedy against phlegm, langor and bleareduess, and a promoter of longevity." Father Alexander de Rhodes, who traveled in China, in 1623, speaks of the use of tea by the Chinese, and of the fact of its having begun to be known in Europe. Olearius, who was in Persia in 1633, mentions the fact of tea being sold in the taverns and largely consumed by the Persians. There is also evidence about the same time that the Japanese were in the habit of consuming tea in the same way as the Chinese, and that tea was sold in England prior to the year 1657 at the rate of from £6 to £10 per lb. The first coffee-shop was opened in London, in George yard, Lombard street, in 1652, by one Paqua, a Greek. In 1660 an act was passed, levying a duty of 8d. "on every gallon of coffee, chocolate, sherbet and tea" made and sold. Mr. Pepys informs us in his diary, under the date of "September 25, 1661. I sent for a cup of tea (a Chinese drink), of which I had never drunk before." We should be glad now to know what he thought of it; but he does not say, and we are thankful for this short notice. In 1665 it is stated that the East India Company ventured to give an order for two pounds two ounces, as a present to his majesty. It was, perhaps this identical two pounds of tea that, when served up at the royal table, appeared in the form of a dish of leaves, with pepper, salt and melted butter, and was found so tough that nobody could eat it. Be that as it may, we find the East India Company ordering 100lbs of tea in 1667; and the demand for it had increased to such an extent, that in 1678 they imported 4,713lb. From such small beginnings has the influence of this powerful drug increased, till its consumption employs a fleet of vessels to bring it to England, and the quantity consumed may be calculated by thousands of tons, while the revenue it produces by taxation is between five and six millions per annum

CHINESE MARRIAGES.

Everybody is interested in knowing how people marry, as well as in the question whom people marry. A correspondent in Shanghai, China, tells us something of the way the rite of marriage is performed in that far-distant land, as follows:

In Pekin, the "Board of Rites" busies itself about many things; and among others it sets apart two days in every month as the days upon which alone marriages can take place. To-day is one of these days, and in consequence thereof several gorgeous palanquins, containing ladies all splendid in jewels and gold, are passing through the narrow streets. These ladies have jeweled crowns upon their heads, and veils of strings of pearls falling over their faces, and embroidered satin tunics and fans of gold tissue. They are going, properly accompanied, to their new homes. One of them is just entering the house of a distiller with whom I have some acquaintance. We shall be welcome; let us go in.

The house is decorated for the fête. It is hung with lanterns inside and out. The courtyard is full of relatives and hangers-on; and at the gate is the comprador, who receives the money-offerings of the visitors; the principal room, opening upon the courtyard, is prepared for the feast. Lanterns are hung from the ceilings, a small joss house, with candles and incense before it, is at one end, and in the middle is the table, on which which stand the small basins of sauces and sliced shell-fish, and goose-flesh, and sweetmeats and cakes, which are the precursive appetisers to a Chinese dinner.

The bridegroom (the son of the proprietor) is lounging on a chair, in his shirt-sleeves, smoking; the bride has gone up to her chamber, where she is sitting on her nuptial couch and receiving her guests. We may go up if we please, but it is less trouble to wait and look about us till she comes down. We crack a joke or two with the bridegroom, and he retires to put on his gorgeous array, and then the bride appears, followed by a retinue of bridesmaids, and escorted by an old woman, the go-between, who has made up the match. We present ourselves in due form, and the bride, who, in spite of her high crown and embroidered tunic and trousers, looks nervous and twitchy, and slightly convulsive, just as she might if her name were Brown, and if we had accosted her at the door of Grace Church, returns our salutation, and would like to pass on. But such is not selon les règles. The duenna insists upon our admiring the beauty of the head-dress and the thickness of the embroidered satin whereof her tunic is made; but, above all, she will pull up the trousers to exhibit the faultless proportions of the little feet. They are marvellously small. A flea couldn't find room to hop in that slipper. "Chin, chin!" let us be off.

There is another decorated dwelling on our way, but it is a cottage, and presents a different scene. Three men are drinking samshu at a table, whilst the bride, dressed in her borrowed bravery, sits on a barrel in the most distant corner, alone and unnoticed. To-morrow and for ever more she will be a beast of burden. Perhaps, however, she will, in the fullness of time, create her own distractions. A few years may probably see a crowd of mangy brats, exhibiting every form and species of cutaneous complaint, fighting and yelling over their rice basins, and, aided by the mother's shrew voice and the grandmother's croak, making their neighborhood unbearable.

Such a family lived opposite my bedroom window at Ningpo. From early cockcrow to sundown the screams and shrill cries were unintermittent. The nuisance burst into being all on a sudden; but I found, on inquiry, that it had existed in its present aggravated form about two years before, and was then cured. After many vain remonstrances, an English merchant complained to the toutar. Next day the lord of the house was sent for to the prefecture, and, being suspended by the thumbs, received 40 blows of the bamboo; he was then dismissed, with a warning. When that respectable housekeeper returned, disjointed and macerated, to his dwelling, he went in and shut his doors about him. What happened in the bosom of that family no man may know; but thenceforward the rice was eaten inside the house, and the screams did not vibrate in the street. When I heard of this I thought I would try what a threat of the toutar would do; so I sent my boy down with a message. He returned with the air of an envoy who had failed. "Well, what does the woman say?" "She talkee, no care—last moon husband dead."

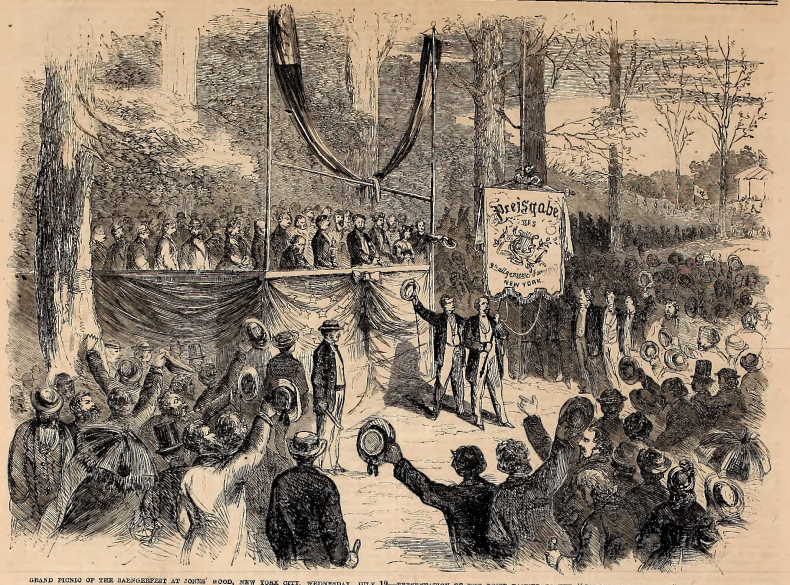
THINGS TO KNOW.

Flexible Paints for Canvas.—Cut one pound and a half of yellow soap into slices, add one gallon of boiling water; dissolve, and mix while hot with one and a quarter hundred weight of oil paint.

Cement for Fixing Metal on Glass or Porcelain.—An excellent cement for attaching metal to glass or porcelain consists in a mixture of a solution of eight ounces of strong glue, and one ounce of varnish of linseed oil, or three quarters of an ounce of Venice turpentine, which should be boiled together and stirred till the mixture is thoroughly mixed.

Composition for Colored Drawings and Prints, to make them Resemble Oil Paintings.—Take of Canada balsam one ounce; spirit of turpentine, two ounces; mix them together. Before this composition is applied, the drawing or print should be sized with a solution of isinglass in water, and, when dry, apply the varnish with a camel-hair brush.

Harness-Makers' Jet.—Take one drachm of of indigo, a quarter of an ounce of isinglass, half an ounce of soft soap, four ounces of glue, one pennyworth of logwood raspings, and one quart of vinegar; boil the whole over a slow fire, till reduced to one pint. A small quantity is to be then taken upon a piece of clean sponge, and thinly applied to harness, boots, &c., taking care that they are previously well cleaned.



The doom of the Kilkenny cats has been predicated as a not unlikely contingency in cases of naval warfare, under the new conditions of gunnery. For it has been suggested that artillery has now become so formidable as to threaten both the contending fleets with absolute and instantaneous destruction, which shall cause them utterly to disappear from off the face of the ocean without leaving anything behind except a few floating chips and a smell of gunpowder.

The Oyster.—Open an oyster, retain the liquor in the lower or deep shell, and if viewed through a microscope it will be found to contain multitudes of small oysters, covered with shells, and swimming nimbly about; 120 of which extend but one inch. Besides these young oysters, the liquor contains a variety of animalculæ, and myriads of three distinct species of worms. Sometimes their light resembles a a bluish star about the centre of the shell, which will be beautifully luminous in a dark room.

Pencils.—The ancients drew their lines with leaden stiles; afterwards a mixture of tin and lead, fused together, was used. The mineral known under the name of plumbago is supposed to have been first employed for the purpose of drawing in the 15th century. In 1565 an old author notes that people had pencils for writing which consisted of a wooden handle, in which was a piece of a lead; and a drawing is given of the pencil as an object of curiosity. They continued to be uncommon for upwards of a century, when we hear them spoken of being enclosed in pine or cedar.

About the year 14 of the Christian era the annual product of gold and silver was $5.000,000; in 1492 it was only $250,000; in 1863 it was $235,000,000, and in 1863 $240,000,000. In the year 14 also the gold and silver in existence is estimated at $1,327,000,000, and in 1863 at $10,562,000,000. The whole amount of gold and silver obtained from the earth from the earliest periods to the present time is estimated at $21,272,000,000.

Woman is never so amiable as when she is useful; and as for beauty, though men may fall in love with girls at play, there is nothing to make them stand to their love like seeing them at work—engaged in the useful offices of the home and family.

GRAND PICNIC OF THE SAENGERFEST AT JONES' WOOD, NEW YORK CITY, WEDNESDAY, JULY 19.—PRESENTATION OF THE PRIZE BANNER TO THE "JUNGES MAENNERCHOR" OF PHILADELPHIA.
FROM A SKETCH BY MR. ALFRED BERGHAUS.

THE GREAT SAENGERFEST IN NEW YORK.

THE convention of the German musical organizations, the colossal preparations of which have been so widely noticed by the metropolitan press, commenced in New York on Saturday evening, July 15th. During the afternoon, a large number of the societies composing the convention, arrived from various cities throughout the Union, all of which were welcomed at the City Hall by Mayor Gunther. The ceremonial was of a most interesting character, and is graphically portrayed by our artist.

On Sunday morning, rehearsals were held at the Germania Assembly Rooms, preparatory to the public concerts at the Academy of Music. The afternoon was given up to visiting places of interest in the vicinity of the metropolis. In the evening, the Academy was literally filled from gallery to parquet, to listen to the grand choruses of 1,200 well trained voices. The pieces sung were selections from Mendelssohn, Mozart and Meyerbeer. In addition to the voices, there were about one hundred of the best instrumental performers in the city.

On Monday morning, a rehearsal was held at the Academy, which was attended by nearly 3,000 singers, about one-half of whom were visitors. The concert at the Academy, in the evening, was a complete success. Every seat was occupied, and had there been twice the number, they would, no doubt, have been filled. Lilienhoff's "Robespierre" inaugurated the ceremonies. Then followed "La Marseillaise," "Sharmerlied," "Up, Grasp the Sword," and the "Soldier's Chorus," all of which were received with the greatest enthusiasm by the audience. The ceremonies concluded with Reiter's "Battle Song," an admirable chorus, and rendered with telling effect.

On Wednesday, a picnic of the organizations and their friends and admirers was held at Jones' Wood. The procession, consisting of upwards of 2,000 singers, was formed in the Bowery, Lafayette place and Great Jones street, whence they marched down the Bowery and Chatham street, to the City Hall, and were reviewed by the Mayor. The streets were filled with admiring throngs to see the singers pass. From the City Hall they proceeded up Broadway, through Bond street, Second street, &c., to the foot of Eighth street, where steamer and barges were waiting to convey them to the festival ground. The distribution of prizes—the most interesting event of the day—came off at four o'clock. The first prize, a banner of blue silk, with silk-cord trimmings, was awarded to the Maennerchor, of Philadelphia society. The second prize, a richly chased, silver goblet, ornamented at the sides by the busts of several eminent German composers, was also won by a Philadelphian society—the Saengerbund. A heavy fall of rain commencing at seven o'clock, the ceremonies were abruptly terminated, minus the splendid fireworks which had been prepared for the finale.

A grand Saenger Commers of the united societies was held at the Germania Assembly Rooms, on Thursday, at which various popular pieces were most appropriately rendered. Among others, the "Star Spangled Banner" was given with excellent effect. On the same day, according to the programme, the festivities terminated. During the afternoon, excursions were made to various places of interest, the different organizations distributing their favors according to inclination. Late in the afternoon and evening, under the auspices of the Arion, a picnic was given to several of the societies at the Linn brewery, 6th avenue and 110th street. Glees and choruses were sung, and immense quantities of lager and "wein" blog, "Carlsbrunner" and "Steinberger" were consumed. A masquerade of the most grotesque description was the telling feature of the jollification. At night the grounds were illuminated by a multitude of Chinese lanterns, and the festivities were kept up till morning. On Friday the guests departed for their various homes, and so ended the ninth German-American Saengerfest.

HORACE WEBSTER.

AMERICA can never forget her system of free schools, nor the able men by whom that system has been made to bear good fruit in actual. Prominent among these stands President Webster, who has from the outset directed the New York Free Academy, the noble university wherein the children of the public receive, as in the universities of the middle ages, a gratuitous course of education, equal to that pursued at any college in the country.

Horace Webster was born in Vermont, in 1793. While fitting himself for college he received an appointment to the West Point Academy, which he entered in the spring of 1814. His class was very numerous, and on graduation, in 1818, was subjected to a severe examination; this first is important, inasmuch as this class was the first which received their appointment in the army in order of their merit at graduation. Among 160 cadets he ranked as fourth, and chose an appointment in the Infantry. He was retained at the academy as instructor in the department of mathematics, and continued for some time in that office under Col. Thayer. When the Geneva College was founded he was solicited to take the office of President, and he there labored till 1847. During that time he introduced a course of science and philosophies, and in numerous other ways advance the welfare of the institution. In 1847, Townsend Harris, the founder of the Free Academy, earnestly requested him to take charge of that noble institution, and it was chiefly through the exertions of Mr. Harris that the Free Academy commenced its history under so competent a head as President Webster. To speak of what he has done for the Free Academy and education in general is needless, the hundreds of young men who have been benefited by it are every day by their actions proving the competency of the President and the advantages of the institution. He has received several honorary degrees. In 1836 the Kenyon College, Gambier, Ohio, conferred the degree of A.M. upon him; in 1837 the Princeton College, New Jersey, conferred the honorary degree of LL.D.; and in 1849 a similar honorary degree was conferred upon him by Columbia College of this city.

Academy, which took place, on the 19th inst., at the Academy of Music, New York, the doctor presided, and received the unfeigned congratulations of his many friends. The occasion was one of interest, and the Academy was filled to repletion by one of the most intelligent audiences ever assembled in the metropolis.

The doctor's health is still good, and he bids fair, for many years to come, to continue adding lustre to a position of which he may be justly proud.

THE STATUE OF HORACE MANN, IN BOSTON.

men of genius. On the occasion of the inauguration, Dr. S. G. Howe delivered the following appropriate address:

"We to-day dedicate a monument to the memory of a man whose greatness consisted in his love for his fellow-men, in his confidence in their innate goodness and their capacity for improvement, and in his burning zeal to elevate and to improve his fellow-men. He loved the people; he lived for and labored for the people; nay, he died for the people, inasmuch as his premature death was brought on by over-zeal and over-work in the cause of the education of the people. Fellow-citizens, it is proper that such a state as Massachusetts should rear a monument to such a man, for it is alike the proof of his greatness and goodness, and of their virtue and intelligence. And the people of Massachusetts have as it—for the means for erecting this statue were given by the people at large, not by the rich. A few rich gave of their abundance; many more gave of their poverty. The schoolmaster who could spare but a dollar, the schoolmistress who could spare but fifty cents, the little boys and girls who could give but a dime—have all contributed to this work, and the state of Massachusetts herself, so as to stamp her approval upon it, by the vote of her legislature, has contributed of the money to build the pedestal. The work itself has been done by a woman—a woman of genius and art, a woman inspired by the nobleness of her subject, and whose cunning hand has wrought out in bronze the monument which we now unveil to you—the statue of Horace Mann."

THE GREAT ROWING MATCH.

AQUATIC races have become, within the past few years, affairs of more than ordinary interest to the amusement-loving public.

Affording, as they do, fine exhibitions of muscular development and skill, thousands throng to the scene of a rowing match, delighted with the vigorous efforts of athletic oarsmen to outstrip each other in the race.

The contest which took place on the Hudson river, at Poughkeepsie, on Tuesday, July 18th, between the New York boat Samuel Collyer and the Poughkeepsie boat Floyd T. Fields, was one of the most exciting ever witnessed in this country. The race was for $3,000 a side, five miles. The New York boat was manned by Dennis Leary, stroke; John Biglin, James H. Biglin, and Bernard Biglin, bow. The crew of the Poughkeepsie boat were Wm. Stephens, stroke; Homer, Woodin, Wm. Burger, and Ezekiel Benevay, bow.

Both crews are well known in the sporting circles, and have generally borne off the palm from all other competitors. Odds were very much in favor of the Poughkeepsie men, on account of their having beaten the same crew (Leary excepted), on the same course last year.

Early in the afternoon the high banks near the scene of the contest were crowded with people, and before the hour for the race the shore between the stakeboats, which were anchored in the middle of the stream, were lined with no less than 10,000 spectators.

At 15 minutes past five the signal was given from the lower stakeboat, a pistol fired, and the rival champions shot from the starting point. The scene was picturesque and bizarre. The large hill opposite the stakeboat swarmed a mass of human beings, and the river swarmed with craft of every description. Barges, propellers, yachts, &c., dotted the placid bosom of the water as far as the eye could reach. The Collyer took the lead from the start and never lost it. The distance between both boats was a half a length until they reached the upper starboards on rounding, however, the Collyer had the advantage, and shot round on her homeward course about half a dozen lengths before the Poughkeepsie boat. The latter struggled hard in the middle of the stream, against wind and tide, to cut off the New York crew, but in vain. The Collyer, by hugging the shore closely, met comparatively smooth water, and it was soon apparent that the Tyrks could not recover her lost ground. Her crew made a gallant struggle, however, and were beaten only by two lengths. The Collyer came in victor in fifty-four minutes past six, having passed the two and a half mile stake-boat at 34 minutes past five.

The exact time of the race was 37 minutes and 10 seconds.

Although the New York crew were declared the victors at the time, subsequently, it is said, the referees and judges sinked they were intimidated into giving their decision in favor of the New York boat. The affair created in a measure a feeling between the oarsmen of the Poughkeepsie boat, was, the day following the race, accosted by a man named De Mott, who resided on the east bank of the Hudson, opposite Poughkeepsie, and who, it is said, had lost heavily on the race, with having offered to sold his friends and assisted the defeat of the Poughkeepsie crew.

An altercation ensued in which Stephens struck De Mott a powerful blow, killing him instantly.

Stephens was immediately arrested. He has the sympathy of his friends, they believing he was entirely innocent of any intention to take the life of De Mott.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A FRIEND OF an artist was endeavoring to persuade him to leave for a month time upon his hands.

"You do not know, then," said he, "that I have a master very difficult to please?"

"What?"

A MAN being interrogated on a trial, spoke several times with much impropriety; and at last saying the word excuse, a counselor ordained:

"How find they that word in the Englishe tongue?"

"Sire," rourned another, "the they knocked an e out."

LORD COCKBURN, the proprietor of Bonaly, was sitting on the hillside with a shepherd, and observing the wily sagacity in the collies' situation, he remarked to him:

"I wish I were a sheep I would lie on the other side of that hill."

The shepherd answered:

"Ay, sir, and if ye had been a sheep ye would ha' had nae sense."

LORD ELDON always pronounced the word here as though it were hare, and Sir Arthur Pigott once roomed the same word ham. On this Eyelah wrote the following epigram:

"Sir Arthur, Sir Arthur, why, what do you mean,
By saying the Chancellor's ham is obscene?
Do you think that his kitchen's so bad as all that,
That nothing which is will ever get ham?"

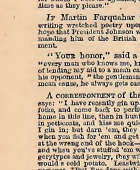
A LOQUACIOUS lady ill of a complaint of 40 years, standing, applied to Mr. Abernethy for advice and had begun to describe its progress from the first. But Mr. A. interrupted her, saying he wanted to go into his next street, "and if I continue to hear you much longer I shall take it into my head to have a fit myself."

A TRADESMAN having dunned a customer for a long time, he died at last, and sent his servant on the morning to admit him.

"Mr. Jenks," said he to him, "I duly paid your account if how, and I have a great regard for you; therefore, I take this opportunity to tell you, that I shall never pay you a farthing, you had better go home, send your bill to me, and don't keep your self in pain here. As for the others, they are a set of vagabonds, for whom I care as a feather, and they may waste their time as they please."

IF Martin Farquahar Tupper doesn't stop writing wretched poetry upon the English people we hope that President Johnson will find authority for demanding him of the British government as a political assassin.



"YORK honor," said a lawyer to the judge, "every man who knows me, knows that I am incapable of telling a lie to a mean man." "Well, sir," said the judge impatient, "the gentleman never lends himself to a mean cause, he always gets cash down."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Portland Transcript says: "I have recently got up all idea of the common potato, and come back to perfection. It is the best at home in this line, then in hunin' the fair sects. Angels in petticoats, as his son quoted, are very fond of it, and a pin in; but darn 'em, they are as slippery as eels; when you go for 'em and get a bite, you find you've got at the wrong end of the hook—you're etched yourself, and when you've raised your temper, swearin, cussin, fingerpyrtyes and jewelry, they will throw you away as they would a last year's bird's nest before the first frost experience. Dyed I've done with 'em now. The Queen of Sheba is dead, and Solomon's lost his wife, with a house and lot to sell, cheap. Don't want 'em. The very sight of a bonnet like me all over."

AN elderly lady, telling her age, remarked she was never so 29 April. Her husband, who was present, observed, "I always thought you were born on the 1st of April!" "People might think so," responded the lady, "in the choice I made of a husband."

How the Soldiers' Money Goes.

The honorable services of the soldiers are regarded in a manner worthy of their public spirit and domestic virtues. They are expending millions in the government loan, and it is significant that while the sale of sewing machines for manufacturing purposes has fallen off with the contracts of army clothing, the sale of the Wheeler & Wilson machine for family uses, that is the gallant soldiers have not forgotten their duty to their wives. Orders are received, while they are in the field on a drum-head, to forward machines to feminine relatives "at once." It is a touching picture for the manager of a large office now to look at his figures for the end of the will have a Wheeler & Wilson sewing machine.

Complete in one volume, bound in cloth. Also a full set of FRENCH DIPLOMED COLORS, in the original powdered state. Brushes, &c.

U. S. 7-30 LOAN

THIRD SERIES

$230,000,000!

By authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, the undersigned, General Subscription Agents for the sale of United States Securities, offer to the public the Third Series of Treasury Notes, bearing seven and three tenths per cent. interest per annum, known as the Seven-Thirty Loan.

These Notes are issued under date of July 15th, 1865, and are payable three years from that date, in currency, or are convertible at the option of the holder into

U. S. 5-20 Six per cent.

GOLD-BEARING BONDS.

These bonds are now worth a handsome premium, and are exempt, as are all the Government Bonds, from State, County and Municipal taxation, which adds fifty per cent to their value per annum, to their value, according to the rate levied upon their property. The interest is payable semi-annually, by coupons attached to each note, which may be cut off and sold to any bank or banker.

The interest at 7-30 per cent. amounts to

One cent per day on a		$50 note.
Two cents	" "	$100	"
Ten	" "	$500	"
50	" "	$1,000	"
$1	" "	$5,000	"

Notes of all the denominations named will be promptly furnished upon receipt of subscriptions.

The Notes of this Third Series are precisely similar in form and privileges to the Seven-Thirties already issued, except that the Government reserves to itself the option of paying interest in gold on all 7-30 notes, instead of the 7-3 thirties. If exercised, subscribers will deduct the interest in currency up to July 15th, at the time when they subscribe.

The delivery of the notes of this third series of the Seven-thirties will commence on the 1st of August, and will be done promptly and continuously after that date.

The slight change made in the conditions of this Third Issue affects only the matter of interest. The payment in gold, if made, will be equivalent to the currency interest of the higher rate.

The return to specie payments, in the event of which only will the option to pay interest in gold be availed of, would, as a matter of equitable justice, have affected under with six per cent. in gold would be fully equal to those made with seven and three-tenths per cent in currency. This is now offered by the Government, and its superior advantages will make it the Great Popular Loan of the People.

THE ONLY LOAN IN MARKET

Less than $200,000,000 of the loan authorized by congress are now in the market. Inasmuch as the rate at which it is being absorbed, will all be subscribed for within sixty days, when the whole will undoubtedly command a premium, as has uniformly been the case on closing the subscriptions to other loans.

In order that citizens of every town and section of the country may be afforded facilities for taking the Loan, the Banks, Bankers, State Banks, and Private Bankers throughout the country have generally agreed to receive subscriptions at par. Subscribers will select their own agents, in whom they have confidence, and who only are to be responsible for the delivery of the notes for the money they receive orders.

A NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Citizens, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and cheerily preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the most perfect and restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present in our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Can Women Commit Murder?

THE clamor against the trial of the conspirators to the assassination of President Lincoln, by a military court in Washington, was based mainly on the indisposition of the nation to submit longer to martial rule than was absolutely necessary to secure the re-establishment of the national authority throughout the country. The people of the United States are justly suspicious and impatient of that sometimes indispensable, but always dangerous instrument of power, martial law. It was thought by many, when the trial of the conspirators took place, that there was no public exigency requiring that their case should be removed beyond the cognizance of the civil courts; but a considerable part of the criticism on the government, on account of its course, was inspired only by hostility to the administration, and came from those who, if not open rebels, had always been sympathizers with the rebellion. The government, however, was not swerved from what it considered its duty, by friendly counsel or hostile criticism, and the result of the recent trial of a woman named Mary Harris, before the District Court of Washington, must convince every impartial mind that it acted wisely, and only in the interest of justice. It is now clear that one certainly, perhaps most of these conspirators, would have escaped the penalty of their crimes, had they been handed over to the judicial Dogberrys and the morally-perverted juries of the national capital.

We need not recapitulate the facts in the case of Miss Harris, which are already painfully notorious. It is enough for our present purpose to say that she came on deliberately to Washington, from some western town—went deliberately to the War Department—and waited there patiently for most of the day, until the clerks left at the usual hour, and then deliberately shot one Mr. Burroughs, mortally wounding him. The trial of this woman, which was conducted with levity and want of decorum, by judge, counsel, jury and spectators, that would have disgraced a police court, elicited that some years ago Burroughs carried on a rather warm flirtation with Miss Harris, who was then a young married woman; that for a considerable number of letters, not more than usually silly and sentimental, and leaving the impression that Burroughs was only on average boy with the wicked habit of writing, but that he was in love with the little milliner. Subsequently it seems, having perhaps mentally kissed the moon enough to have his head, his passion died out, and falling in with some sensible woman, he redeemed his previous folly by marrying her and settling down to business. He came to Washington, was employed in the Treasury Department, and seems to have comported himself with propriety—was industrious, steady, and in all respects a good citizen.

The little milliner, however, was not satisfied to let the little love flame lighted in her little heart smolder in its ashes. She began to pile fresh fuel of most girls, milliners and others, but must fan it into a consuming fire, quenchable only with blood. In this process she naturally "got out of her head," became insane, hysterical, and manifested, on several occasions, the ordinary symptoms of those ailments — exceedingly common, alas! — which wretched lawyers who conducted her defence, and which they failed not to represent as evidences of an insanity which overcame all knowledge of right and wrong, and made the subject irresponsible.

There was an attempt on the trial to show that Burroughs, by seducing the poor little girl into a house of ill-fame, with a view of blasting her character, and creating an excuse for marrying another, and to show that this was premeditated, and that he was therefore the original cause of the terrible tragedy of frenzy resulting in the murder. But the attempt miserably failed. Nothing—absolutely nothing—was proved, save the testimony of girls that he had made foolish love in the common foolish way—an offence so common and trivial that even when pushed to the very extreme of seduction, it is punished in courts of justice only as pretty well atoned for by "six cents damages and costs," in a suit for breach of promise.

And yet this woman was acquitted by a Washington court and jury, on the ground of insanity—not your absorbing, continuous insanity, that wholly eclipses reason and nature, and controls the mind with an irresistible impulse, but of an intermittent and more convenient variety. It was not pretended that Miss Harris was insane all the while—only when she left home to commit the murder, when she bought the pistol, when she loaded it, and when she fired it. At all other times she was sane enough. Her witnesses, who seem to have been prepared to swear up to their business, could not be made to testify to the symptoms of insanity, but wholly evaded the primary life and conduct. A convenient doctor or two, it is true, succeeded in making a muddle on the subject, not very satisfactory to even themselves, and which could only excite disgust and contempt, except with a Washington jury resolved on an acquittal.

As we have said, Miss Harris was acquitted, after a charge from the presiding judge, which should lead Congress to alter the composition of the Washington judiciary with the least possible delay, and went out of court, after a grand tableau, in which slobbering, barraking and kissing, alternated with hand-shaking and other extravagant congratulations. No one thought of the poor clerk, shot down like a dog; nor of his wife, in her weeds and desolate home! Thus was the temple of justice defiled! Thus was the prudence and foresight of the government vindicated in not putting Mrs. Surratt, nor even Payne, on trial before a Washington court and jury! Had it done so, we might have read in the telegraphic summary in this morning's journal, "Mrs. Surratt arrived last evening at the — House, Baltimore. She was attended by Judge ——, of Washington, and was welcomed by a large party of friends at the depot." Or: "Mr. Payne, the gentleman who was so triumphantly acquitted by an enlightened jury, in Washington, of an attempt to murder Mr. Seward, has reached town. He is the guest of our distinguished fellow-citizen, Mr. ——." The injury which he sustained in his right hand, during his encounter with Mr. Frederick Seward, we are happy to learn, is rapidly disappearing."

It was not our intention, at the outset, to dwell so long on this wretched mockery of justice in Washington, but to direct, so far as in our power, attention to that public feeling or sentiment which seems to exempt women from judgment by that standard of justice and responsibility which is so rigidly applied as regards the other sex. No case can bring up more distinctly the right or wrong of this feeling than that of Miss Harris, and it behoves all thinking men, and those who have the welfare of the community at heart, to give it serious consideration. On what ground of justice or humanity can women to be exempted from that accountability which society has found it necessary and expedient to establish for the protection of itself and both sexes? Are women presumed to stand in perfect equality? Is crime less criminal because perpetrated by a women? Or do the civil systems deal in some subtle sophistry by which women are to escape that they shall have greater latitude in others? Is it because they have no direct voice in framing the laws, that, therefore, they shall have immunity from their infliction, while they enjoy their guarantees? Is it because we feel conscious that we exact the utmost penalty on our unfortunate victims of social laws, which men are scarcely noticed, that we are disposed to allow her a compensating latitude in other directions? Or is this feeling, to which we have referred, the offspring of an unhealthy sentimentality, or an imperfect concession to the repugnance to capital punishment, which has so wide a diffusion in the community, and which, without demanding a complete change in the laws, satisfies itself for the present, and chirks the main question by insisting only on their partial application?

We are inclined to think that the latter is the true explanation of the actual anomaly in the treatment of female offenders. The community, a wretched conservatism, which is making murder a pastime for women. We may as well at once concede that, after the Washington affair, that women cannot be convicted of murder. Miss Harris committed murder or nothing. It is impossible for any other indictment; but thet of "wilful murder" against her, and on thet issue she hed to be tried. The jury had to bring in a verdict of wilful murder premeditated, or acquit her. To have adjudged her only guilty of homicide would have been to burlesque the forms and make ridiculous the solemn proceedings of the Court of law. The punishment of "wilful murder" is death, and the jury was determined not to hang a woman!

There was a time in England when sheep-stealers were the favorite victims, and when sheep-stealers were rigorously hung. There came a time, while the same laws were still on the statute book, when it became impossible to hang a man of sheep-stealing, because juries did not believe sheep-stealing was an offence deserving of death. When the punishment was modified, convictions for the offence became practicable.

The parallelism is not altogether complete, but the change in public sentiment, as regards capital punishment—especially as sex and cards women—has been similar. Juries will not convict them of the crime, so long as the penalty attached to it is prescribed. There is the naked fact. And yet there is not a juror, outside of Washington certainly, who would pretend that female murderers should not be punished, and in exemplary manner.

What is the remedy for a condition of things that all admit is wrong and dangerous? Judges may lecture, and theorists may demonstrate, and sentiment may plead on the plain, simple Americans who sit on juries, have hearts abounding with affection and generous sentiments, and no oath is strong enough, no sense of obligation to the law is sufficiently powerful to make them say "guilty" in certain cases of legal murder. If, by any process of mental jiggery, they can persuade themselves that the case has an element of uncertainty, they let the prisoner go free; and when their humanity tells them of the existence of extenuating circumstances, they not seldom reform the law without heeding judicial instructions. Of course, by the theory of law, these jurors act foolishly and culpably; and by the theory of common sense, the law acts foolishly and culpably in placing human set men in such a position, that they feel perjury to be their duty.

Our present system of capital punishment does not accord with the moral sense of the country; and to spare themselves the anguish and shame of degrading spectacles, people are having recourse to the appalling theory—that every person is insane who commits murder under the slightest possible temptation.

On all other matters we accept the scientific definition of insanity, and refuse to call a man insane who does not suffer under incoherence, fatuity, or delusion; but when a comely murderer is tried by public opinion, thousands of good persons persuade themselves that he is insane, although they are familiar with the scene of drinking, or the mystery of courting, the right in certain states of society. But when I turn from that short-sight and that short-sighted expediency, to our own state of society—when I consider how difficult it is to find a jury for a capital case, unless prepared to practice justice, from that which admits the force of mitigating circumstances—how invidious it is to put the Secretary of State in dispensing the mercy of the Government, and how impossible it is for the latter, even soon the object of general horror becomes the theme of pity and praise, to temper mercy and justice, I find the examples given by this cowardice and awful punishment—a terrible lesson of cowardice—I come to the conclusion that nothing would be lost to justice—nothing lost in the preservation of innocent life, if the punishments of death were altogether abolished. In that case, a sentence for life, or a shorter punishment, followed by another term of hard labor and hard fare, would be accepted as an extension of mercy. The sentence of the judge were to be executed. The public would not be shocked by the infliction of punishment in cases of mercy, and the criminal would have the benefit of repentance in time and opportunity to turn repentant to the throne of mercy."

Since the publication of our last, an explanation, evidently from the State Department, has exonerated our Minister in Mexico, Mr. Bigelow, from the charge of using the language imputed to him in the Monileur, as regards the United States and Mexico. Immediately on the publication of the article in which officials appear, Mr. Bigelow addressed a note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, requesting a correction to be made, which was promptly, and very properly, accordingly. We are happy to find that Mr. Bigelow did not commit the blunder attributed to him, in thus publishing to the outside of direct and unyielding hostility to the French occupation of Mexico has been in no way compromised or misrepresented by him. There it and can be no mistake in this matter. France must leave Mexico, quietly, it is to be hoped—forcibly, if necessary. There is no article in the American faith more record or more widely accepted than that embodying the short principle laid down by Monroe, and which has made his name immortal.

BOOK NOTICES, ETC.

THE Atlantic Monthly for August opens with a very interesting paper on "Recollections," by Miss Prescott, Spear, in which she writes about the Second Session in Washington, in the Continental Hotel, in 1863-4. Mr. Baker has a most feeble imitation of the Spasmodic style in a piece of poetry, called the Second Love. These echoes, however well done, are not worthy of American poets.

Tuckerman's Fields' magazine for "Our Young Folks," for August, is very successful. The articles in this number are very good, and the reading will adapted to both old and young children.

TOWN COSSIP.

We have received several letters from old subscribers who, while owning their inability to go out to the country, or to spend any time or money away from home in the city, as there was in the good old days of Niblo. We have not forgotten the amphitheatre years of late and of old, and there was an invitation of half an hour, to enable the audience to adjourn into a free open space of gardens, where ice creams, sherbets, and claret negus gave a double zest to the Naval pantomimes. It was a great improvement upon the Circus, however, to allow fair flesh to a comfortable seat in the adjoining grounds, and, tasting Gunynede, stand by for the next. Those old archways of cooling punch and strawberry cream. In those days the managerial cupidity had not converted the comfortable of empty benches into instruments and traps of torture, where a moderate-sized human being is fixed in as firmly as a cock in a fighting hand, and where the spectacle a mammoth dentist's fork to extract every occupant. It would be unfair to say anything more unhopeful than those iron skeletons, which are sarcastically called seats, and rejoice in being unbolted, as the days move on. Remain. You can have pews at Barnum's, hear at Mitchell's Olympic, and see Mary Taylor, then not her final benefit, if you pondered a private mask and sangaree, in the Vauxhall Gardens, where now stands the Astor Library.

In those cheap and ancient gardens an Irish meeting was held to celebrate the great Milesian victory of the ecumenon, when Gen. Brian Wallbridge, then an elegant young gentleman, garbed in Fox's most elaborate style, and with a rich scarlet sash, called upon the Irish to resist the British red coats, as their ancestors did, "in their boots—in town coats!" which they wore, "in Parliament, and in their best!" So the general's instructions go.

But we must hear ourselves away from this dream of our youth, and observe that, with the exception of Barnum's patriotic concert, and the Winter Garden, there is nothing to report in the theatrical world. In the meantime, if any of his friends wish to send him a present, we may be pitched for the best of Museum in the Chinese Buildings, Broadway, where he will remain till the end of the season.

Brooklyn has indulged in a supplementary accident in Fourman street, on the very next where, some months ago, several lives were lost in a fire. We had hoped that the miserable plan of making gardens on the roofs of houses would have been abandoned; but on the present occasion the New York press lays the blame on the scarcity and concealt of the cause of the property, where the double calamities occurred. We trust the coroner's jury will have the courage to do its duty, and indict the guilty party, whatever his wealth and standing in society may be. A British House of Commons has just indicted the keeper of the Queen's conscience; let us imitate Ie pluck.

Jesse Wood, which has lately been resonant with the ever-twisted Tatsions, there has not the benefit of race in their native land, only, when they come away, they don't carry their grievances with them.—Jesse Wood, recently before the echo of "Faust" has died away, has resonantly with the sensible threats of the Fenians, who met there to terrify that tooth so old beast, the British Lion. Col. Rolee to make a very eloquent speech, which will, we are sure, strike more terror into the hearts of his fellow-countrymen, Lord Palmerston, than the bombast of Fenians. Apart from the political side of affair, the meeting was very orderly conducted, and gave our Irish fellow-citizens a pleasant holiday.

In the Police Court, the other day, a man was charged with rioting in one of the Third Avenue cars, which was so disorderly conducted that, during the time the fighting women and sex using children had to be removed out of the windows. We call the attention of the public to the following part of the evidence:

"Mr. Dillon, a conductor on the Third avenue railroad, testified that, at the time in question, the car was pretty near full.

"Q. What do you call full? A. When we get 800 to 200 passengers in it.

"Q. Are not many here you could? A. Twenty-four.

"Q. Is it the orders of the company to fill a car that way? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Is it left discretionary with the conductors? A. It is left with the people whether they get in or not."

The conductor hits the nail on the head when he says: "It is left with the people whether they will incommodious themselves, or not, others."

When the company raised the fare one cent, there was almost a popular outcry on the occasion, and the several lines the extra cent demanded was abandoned; but the continued swindle and insolency of putting three persons in a car when it is only accommodation for one, is quietly submitted to. As the conductor says, it is the people that will that do, and so the people have themselves to blame.

Of the various subscriptions for the relief of our noble soldiers, the Sixth ward, 385 Fourth avenue, New York, may be considered, in point of speciality, the most prominent. The worthy trustees of the ward propose that the furnishing committee relief to soldiers returning to their homes, visiting before them the sick and footsore, and giving them all necessary information concerning the route they are to travel; the fare they are to pay, and the best manner they can do it; and, in addition, the soldier's Rest is supported strictly by private subscription, and is managed by those in immediate interest. John Van Deuzen and Joseph O'Brien, both old soldiers, are the attendants, and, through their efficient care many hundreds of many veterans have been cordially provided for, and "sent on their way rejoicing."

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—Terrific storms of rain, thunder and lightning have visited several localities in the Eastern States. Portland, Conn., was visited with one which converted the city into a river; Cincinnati, also was much damaged by one at the same time.

Preparations for the traveling friends were welcomed at Salem, Oregon, on the 19th of July, by Gov. Gibbs and the leading citizens.

— Gen. Grant and his family are at Saratoga.

— The celebrated warrior, Bloody Hand, so well known as the most sanguinary of all the Sioux Indians, died on the 16th ult., in his 104th year.

— Fort Fisher and Fort Fulton are to be the sole fire at Burnham's Museum, fell on the 18th ult., July 29, 1865, were slightly damaged by. Fortunately the workmen were at dinner.

— The Fenians are encamped at Limerick, Ireland, over 20 persons were drowned.

— Miss Pauline Burnham, youngest daughter of J. T. Burnham, arrived from Bad Kreuznach on the 17th of July, and much injured.

— The last rebel pirate, the Shenandoah, is constantly visited by depredations in the Arctic ocean, having burnt eight American whalers. In February next several more will fall into his hands.

— It is reported that the heroic youth, who has gained much applause by plunging in and saving drowning persons, in the Red River, has been discovered to be one of the world-be soldiers, "rescued from the jaws of death," by going home to his mother.

— Yale College has been especially honored by her son, the ex-President. She sent 1,000 people to the war, of whom 56 were graduates, 3 have been killed in battle, 3 brigadier-generals, 17 majors, 1 of whom is a surgeon, others of lesser grade. Alfred H. Terry, of New Haven, is one of the many "citizen soldiers" of the native and soldier. Gen. Rice, who fell in the Wilderness, and many others.

— Gen. Sully has arrived at Fort Sully, Minn., with his forces. He is about moving on to Fort Rice, where he will make a treaty with the Indians, should be the main purpose of giving battle.

— On the 19th inst., a ball will down in Furman street, Brooklyn, starting in its name several of the workmen, whose mutilated bodies were recovered after several hour's hard labor. Considerable indignation was manifested against the director of the building, who is considered as the chief party to blame.

— Ben Hall, a notorious bushranger, popularly known as Billy Mullings, was killed recently at 8.10 Peninsula, in the county of New Galloway, on the 5th inst., aged 26.

— The Dow Richmond made her experimental trip from New York to Albany on the 26th of July. It was a perfect success, and proves that she is one of the fastest and handsomest boats on the river.

— The N. Y. Herald says that Jeff Davis is in the receipt of numerous offers of employment, if he is having himself, and upon the south.

— The official statement of the capture of the Illfated ship William Nelson, burned off the Banks of Newfoundland, on the 4th of July, with a loss of 16 passengers, is published. The fire arose from the carelessness of a boy, who, when 4 years old, was drowned.

— The little city of Hudson, on the North river, in this State, is a town, we have passed recently at the mercy of a band of roughs on the 18th of July. On that day a procession was made up of the boys of the Fifteenth Guard of Albany, and with it came a gang of ruffians, who, with drums, fifes, and other instruments at fallow, attacked, beat and robbed the citizens on the streets, entered and ravished the public press, and kept up a reign of riot and terror during their stay in the town. The police authorities of the city were gone, police, cools and clones, and no great was the consternation caused by their visit. Gov. Fenton was down and children in their fright fled for safety to the nearest country. A number of citizens received serious injuries, helpless old men and boys being the persons principally assaulted. Only six of the scoundrels were arrested, and two of those were in mind on paying a small fine. These outrages are becoming so common that we positively see no secure for the villains we propose them.

Obituary.—Isaac Taylor, the well known, philosophical writer, died lately in his 77th year. He was born in England, August 17th, 1787. Educated for the church, he preferred literature, devoted his life to philosophical and religious study and writing, and published a large number of works, some of which had a wide popularity. His first book was "Elements of Thought," (1822)—a Scotch metaphysical treatise. In 1829 appeared enormously the "Natural History of Enthusiasm," one of his most popular work, overwrought by zeal. A mythical in theology, but influential at the time. He was an opponent of Puseyism, and published a series of tracts against it. "St. Spiridon Deacon" and "Puseyism within the Pale of the Church." Sir Edward Stephen as a treatise on Ecclesiastical Policy, and he followed it in many books relating to that subject. To-gether with Truth, he prepared a new translation of Bossuet's History. He wrote largely on his all the different reviews.

Foreign.—Although the elections are not quite over in England, the indications are sufficient to show that Lord Palmerston and Earl Russe ministry have been re-lect in the last Parliament.

— Sir Rodoyck Murchison communicates to the London Times, a letter from Mr. Baker, the discoverer of Nyanza lake, in Central Africa. The last discovery substantiates the opinion advanced by Speke, that the Nile rises in the Lake Nyanza, a view of the question which it is no course to Condemn.

— The new electoral law in the British colony of Victoria, Australia, will secure to every propriety holder a vote, and double that number where he owns their new place. The 14th day of the month has been made memorable by the assassins. Orsini, Charlotte Corday, Booth, Payne, their many attempts such as the 14th, and Prese and Lincoln was cast on the 14th of April, 1865. In fact, the 14th day of the month may be considered the unlucky day for royalty, and most especially Lincoln, Napoleon III., Queen Victoria, George IV., George III., George V., William IV., Washington, President Lincoln, and others, have all died on a Saturday.

A TURKISH MARRIAGE.

At one o'clock, on a hot day, under a scorching sun, and through dry dusty streets that made one with fire a little whirlwind each we started to a Turkish marriage. Our own escort in color costume, and an elon-colored cortege of the Pasha's, marched before and following a sturdy stick in his hand, and with the weapons in his belt. It was a long weary walk, and and weive of our fine clothes—for we had made ourselves as fine as we could—and the constant escort, and the imitations of little boys with no end of blue calico in their costumes, made the way more fine and long. On arriving at a dreary house with a few sombre trees keeping guard at the front, we were given long cotton umbrellas and paraded to Harem and this brother-cross, and climbing an unstable fine-worn staircase, we found ourselves in the harem, and were waiting a la gymnast, where numerous Turkish women were assembled, we were ushered into an inner room full of women, fat, thin, and a few female black slaves. The walls of this apartment were painted in a large branch of garlic hanging in the room corner to keep away the evil eye. We were graciously received by the handsome and handsomely dressed wife of the governor, Mr. Bayruth, in white muslin and rose-colored ribbons, and the mother of the bridegroom, a little woman with an intelligent withered face. She was robed and trimmed in yellow and white silk; necklace and earrings of fine pearls, her head draped with white muslin and trimmed with lace. Her grey feet clad in silken hose and Turkish slippers.

The daughter-in-law for bride a fat white teeth and a tuft of blue feathers.

We were invited to sit on the divan; chairs were stood for the use of those who may curried in an adjoining chamber; my nephew was called on to a large cushion in the middle of the room, and we were shortly joined by all. On the floor were several immense cushions, like the one on which my nephew was seated, and a divan on which many of the guests sat. Under a canopy at one end of the divan, the bride was seated, à la Turque, and motionless as a statue. So handsome and pretty she looked, one of the children fancied at first that she was a wax figure, presented to her as the bride's wedding dress. Her dress—a present from her husband—was of rich blue silk and gold-colored flowers. Her head-dress was profusely ornamented with brilliants; necklaces and earrings of the same—presents from the mother of the bride. Behind her was a large mirror, and two pieces black pasteboard, about the size of a four-penny piece, a talisman to drive away the evil eye, peeped through one of the patches came off; then a slight movement as was perceptible in the handsome head of the bride, and the mirror was replaced. Then an expressive glance from the refractory patch into some sort of gum, and stuck it on again.

The bride was a Circassian, apparently about twenty, one of the many wishes of the defunct Sultan, who wisely good children with the flesh and dark eyes and hair, a restful fair skin and regular features and pretty hands; her feet were small, and her brilliant complexion, due to the Pasha, he should himself of taking a wife, the features of the bride and the mother of the bridegroom's mother set off for Constantinople, and finding the favorable reports confirmed, brought home the pair in charge of a eunuch. He and his lord were sons in bride till a few days before the wedding. That they see and not to be seen.

"Hyppy le the wooing
That is not long of doing."

Fastened round the bride's neck under the canopy where fit she sat, were tastefully strung of shawls, sea-fa nanded orchids of many colors, cloth and velvet caps and long, elegantly-fitting jackets of the Turkish lady's costume, and forming part of the bride's trousseau.

Among the guests were several Turkish ladies who were in colored silk, some in colored muslin or calico, others in white muslin, and some in black cashmere and silk. They wore their hair twisted round the head and partly concealed by a handkerchief or falling in intermingle behind behind it. Several generally crossed with a handkerchief in grace or silk shafts, ribbon or feather, which was arranged in various ways. Some wore their hair at two feet their hair cut short. Some wore Turkish slippers; others high heeled boots. Most of the women were in good spirits and looked as if they were enjoying their handsome, except the bride. A few of them had painted young gentlemen with a fine face in front. Those young gutes, that call so pip when seen going momentarily from the husband, and the bridegroom's mother, &c.

There was a hearty, cheery air about some of the women; they were fat withal and well dressed; the manners of the ladies were free and easy, and full of dignity of their lives. They chatted with each other, laughed and talked occasionally with us; we gave presents to the few Turkish words we had learned for the occasion, looked at our dress, and doubtless thought it as extraordinary as we thought theirs. Some were decidedly graceful, their peculiar skills and picturesque costumes gave a touch to their appearance.

All the women were long, full trousers, and some had their outer robe sweeping the ground; others were a long white jacket, which fell in a good way from the waist. None of them seemed to have any stays, and it was indeed a relief to see a room full of women without out crinoline. I was to that probably not one of these poor souls could read or write. Among the guests were a few Jewesses, and a number of Greeks, a handsome Circassian slave, when he purchased some time ago by the new governor from the slave-market of Smyrna, and had come here with.

We had arrived in the morning to know if my nephew Ronald might accompany us. As he had not numbered eight years he was allowed to enter the sacred precincts, but he felt the gift of the new scimitar into his belt. There were many children present, both boys and girls; the latter, with their mothers, covered with ornaments, necklaces, earrings, and bracelets of the finest beads and silver. One little girl had on a stiff, dark green, large-patterned silk dress, that might really do said to stand alone; it was a little beauty, and about as unsuitable a dress to guard a frock. As the small, stately personage crossed the room, some one was heard of three standard pianos at the time of Queen Elizabeth, where little girls took even more pleasure than they do now in crinoline.

We were hospitably entertained. A pretty young creature, with bean-stained fingers, glossy nut-brown hair, and sweet, soft eyes, presented us with coffee, sweets and water. Presently another woman, carrying a large tray on an exquisitely fine arrangement, covered with red, green and gold, gave us almond milk. Some time after a boy with a brass kettle brought round, with a brass Turkish fashion, placing the fairyike unhandled cup (finges) into a base of filigree silver (zarf), not unlike an egg-cup in form. There was something thoroughly Oriental in the whole scene; the stained-glass figure on the divan, the women and children in their strange eastern attire, the black slaves with tattooed cheeks and gaudy garments standing around, one or two of them occupied with the coffee service, whose aromatic fragrance filled the room; wild, monotonous music came stealing in through the open windows, when, grouped on a bar see, several men were playing on a large guitars harp and on other musical instruments. The windows communicating with the outer chamber were darkened by lattice-bars of a square, with latticework, peeping into our room; a negress, with glistening teeth and pyllow kerchief round her head also taking a survey of the Frankish family.

The modesty, and an intelligent young negress, whose good manners and almost male sex evinced by her-ce-ding natives, were the only people who could talk Greek with Christian. She spoke an easy, but dogmatic and that we could understand some in-ormation about the bride.

The elder ladies had gone to dine in a neighboring apartment the women were dining in the outer room and we. We as old the mother if she b ide was not going to be unhappy. No she was not happy—to be shut off her husband, and her daughter, of her dinner. It seems she had breakfasted on a small portion of pilaff, and tomorrow would be married. Then, for a little more, she looked weary and somewhat sad. Why was she so sad? Why, she had been shamed by a male doctors so many people, but when she spoke with one or two of her companions, she would talk to them. We suggested that the bride might have a headache after the many days and arrangements. Oh, no; her son was her only child, and would gladly do what he can to make him. We expressed our satisfaction of the bride's looks. He son, she seemed to think, were better looking, and though not pretty, she would send for him, if we would come at the same hour next day. We should then see the bridegroom and bride together.

Under two glass-cases, at the other side of the room, were a number of bridal presents. Under one glass case was a china dessert service, preserve-plates, silver sandiers &c, and other articles of plate; all from the bridegroom's father. In the Isle Sultan, who must have enough to do, at his desires all her son's widows and children to make presents. On the Isle Sultan's other case, were the husband's presents to his wife. A silver coffee-table and a large silver tray, and a pair of satin slippers, a pair of embroidered slippers, worthy of Cinderella.

Several night were towels with colored borders, a shirt with embroidered front, a pair of brace s adsomely worked in silk and gold, and a red cap with a blue tag for holding a comb to trim the head of the tassel bobber. These were the bride's gifts to her lord and master. On the bridegroom's bridal head was delighted to show us all the finery. The bride looked at the bridegroom's presents in her turn. She was saying good-by to the mother and the bride, we passed through the room where the commissary was at dinner, and the bridegroom's mother was found there, on which were his black wooden spoons, and seemed to have plenty of everything, and was looking well, pitiful, and full.

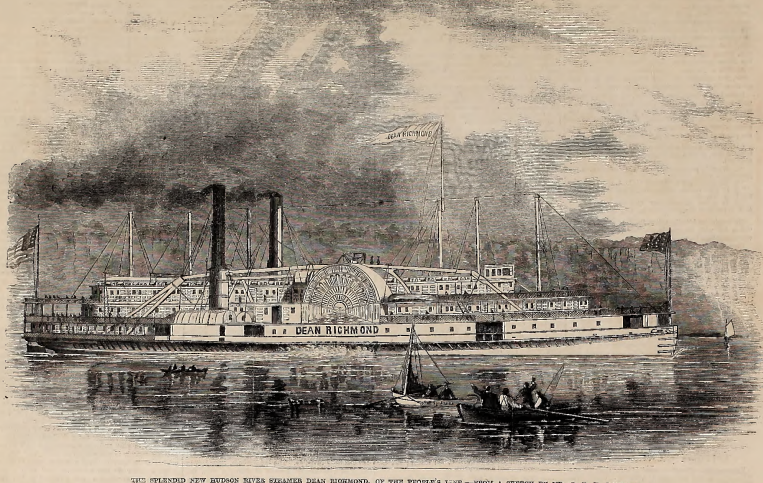
We returned the next day to the chief reception-room, and found the bride and her lord at the divan, but robed in pink and crape and sitting on a chair, chatting merrily to the women next her, her pelisse off, and her head-dress pushed back, and in small slippers. After we had sat awhile, and been kindly treated to coffee, sweets and excellent cream, the women suddenly became very animated, looking eagerly from the windows towards the east room. A general movement took place, and signed her hands, and said something in Turkish. The women, like a flock of sheep, running to the bride's side, and left the room was coming. The bride went into the outer room to us at this, and the groom, and left, with a shawl over her head. He led her to her place under the canopy, and sat down by his mother's side, and the bride sat by her husband. Sherbet, iced and sugar, and coffee was handed round. Then the bride and again like a statue. The other women sat down on the divan, and looked in their usual position. The other women came and pay their respects to the bride, and after talking a few minutes, the son got up to bow, and the bride and bridegroom left the room, and the house. Again the negress clapped her hands, and the ladies rushed out to hear talking place. The bridegroom was standing in the outer room, with hand in hand as before. Then, amid much noise and laughter, the bride was carried out, and left in her husband with a large hooded mess, and it is cast short, rushed up to us, and ask d if we thought the husband handsome.

Shortly after, in pelisse and farewell, we, by one, left the house, and the bride and her lord alone in the governor's wife and the bride, most of them lightly touching their forehead and heart, and then saluting each other with the hand to hand to arm of the former's rete, kissed it, made a slighter obeisance to the bride, and passed on. We next saw her, a long time, her shoulder of the mother, and the latter blessed the hand of the bride, and then went up to the bride lovingly, times two being of higher rank than the rest.

When a man of inferior rank pays his respects to a man of superior rank, it is the custom to kiss the hem of his superior's coat. Our pasha is a large fat man, and appears to be very partial to snuff, he draws back his coat to prevent it from being kissed; the great, kind of being repeated, pashas all the time of the ceremony. The ladies, gathering the dispatch as most together, makes haste to get out of the way by the time the ceremony is over. The bride is generally guest carrying after him. This pretty little farce goes on for a short time, till one or two are left to be saluted.

We were among the last of the guests to say farewell to the bride, and have the latter, the mother going with us to the door and making very speeches as we passed. Her son gave a dinner some days before, to which we were invited, but we were not able to go.

You must know Turkish wedding has about a week, and we only come in for the latter part of the bridal festivities.



Among other ceremonies, the bride is taken to the bridegroom's house, and there puts her little foot on of her hands, and ties them together. She is then carried up to the bridal chamber, and placed on a couch, a present walking on each side to keep her from falling off, and thus conducted to by husband's house. The bride and bride are united, and the clock take off the bridegroom offers her a certain sum as dowry, asking if she is satisfied with the amount. She replies that it is a necessary turn of mind, there is a long parley until he increases the sum to the satisfaction of the bride.

She then is left of her maids, her hands untied, the bridegroom kicks a basin for her to wash her face in from the fingers. Honey and pomegranates are served to the bride, who then receives the bridegroom's presents and retires; the latter that her household must always be plentifully provided for, as scarcity there, no poverty-stricken case emphatically no empty house.

In one part of the ceremony, the father of the bride goes to see her alone, and gives her a purse of money

THE SPLENDID NEW HUDSON RIVER STEAMER DEAN RICHMOND, OF THE PEOPLE'S LINE.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. C. E. B. BONFILS.

THE NEW STEAMER DEAN RICHMOND, OF THE PEOPLE'S LINE.

Of the many magnificent enterprises characteristic of metropolitan shipbuilders, the splendid New York and Albany steamer Dean Richmond may justly be considered the perfection of river-steamboat architecture. The People's Line have, by their enterprise and enormous outlay, created an impetus in the business of river navigation, which has no parallel on this continent. The Dean Richmond resembles the idea of a floating palace. Like the St. John, she combines all the improvements of a first-class hotel with the accommodations afforded only on the great ocean steamers.

The Dean Richmond was built at a cost of $700,000, and has accommodations for 900 first-class and 600 second-class passengers. Her internal arrangements are of the best possible style and character, and neither pains nor expense have been spared to make her the most commodious and comfortable boat employed in inland navigation.

THE life-preservers most frequently used in the battlefield are long tags.

OFFICE OF THE UNION HOTEL, SARATOGA.

OF all the busy, bustling scenes so noticeable at our fashionable hotels, where summer tourists most delight to congregate, none can be compared with the noise or scene of pyramids of trunks, the rush of visitors, and the general appearance of the office of the great Union Hotel, at Saratoga, on the arrival of the steamboat train from Albany. The Messrs. LeGrade have made the Union Hotel not only one of the grandest and most extensive establishments of the kind in the world, but they have secured the patronage of The Elite who admire Saratoga and its beautiful surroundings.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT HORSES.

To those of our readers who, like ourselves, are compelled, during this salamandrine weather, to remain in New York city, and who are in want of a "sight sensation," we would suggest a visit to the Government Stables, in 35th street, near 11th Avenue. Now that the "cruel war is over," and thousands of our soldiers are being disbanded, a similar fate awaits some thousands of horses, who will charge the enemy or answer to the call of the bugle no more, but, like their former riders, will have to assume habits of peace, some to the whistle of the ploughboy, others to the tradesman of city life, while a select few may possibly bear on their backs the Rotten-rotten of Central Park.

There is every variety of character, both human and equine, to be seen at these horse sales—the sharp and decisive auctioneer, the rotund and well-to-do livery stable-keeper, the embarrassed farmer, the young American "sport," the German grocery-man, the rough-and-ready miner, and last and most important, the "speculator" par excellence, ever alive to chances.

The sales, which take place twice a week, are largely attended, and the horses, as a general thing, bring good prices.

SPEED OF SOUND.—Everybody must have remarked that sound takes time to travel to a distance. The varying interval between a flash of lightning and the thunder which follows it is a familiar example. Watch a woodman felling a tree. Unless you be quite near him, you will see the blow given by the axe before you hear the stroke. In consequence of the supreme swiftness of light, we may assume that you see the blow at the very instant it is given. The interval, therefore, between seeing and hearing the blow, is the time which sound takes to travel from the tree to the spot where you are; and this very appreciable interval becomes longer the further you are removed from the working woodman. Refer to a spot where the interval of time shall be exactly a second, measure the distance from the spot to the tree, and you have the speed of sound, or the number of yards which sound travels in a second.

MAGNESIUM.—A few years ago, magnesium was worth $200 an ounce; now it can be bought at $2 an ounce, so greatly has the cost of its manufacture been cheapened; and it is now produced as wires and screw-rods of considerable size and thickness, as well as in the form of wire. It is also highly useful for illuminating purposes, and experiments have been made with a view to the adoption for street lighting instead of gas. Of its brilliance, there is no question; it throws gas on all ordinary lights into a shadow. A company in Ann Arbour, where gas is sold at $4 the thousand feet, works, not long ago, to the secretary of a scientific society in London, to ask whether magnesium could not be afforded at less cost. The inventive faculty is so busy at the present day, that it is not impossible a satisfactory answer may be given before the world is many years older.

BABY.

BY ESEN E. REXFORD.

We knelt beside our baby's bed,
Just at the break of day,
And saw the sunshine of her life,
For ever fade away.

We watched the blighting bloom of death
Fall o'er our baby's brow,
And prayed in bitterness of heart—
"God spare our darling now."

Just at the first faint glow of day
Flamed up the eastern sky,
We felt the spectre's presence near,
And knew that she must die.

I strained my baby to my breast,
And kissed her pallid lips;
Oh! bitter pain to see her sink
Into death's dark eclipse!

She opened wide her tender eyes,
And looked into my own,
And then I knew how dear to me
My little one had grown.

She put her hands into my hair,
As with a mute caress,
Then laid her little tired head
Upon my aching breast.

The sunshine hit the eastern sky,
With an auroral light,
And baby passed into the land
Where there is no more night.

Her blue eyes closed in death's long sleep;
God bore her soul away;
And with the break of morn it passed
Into a perfect day.

A NIGHT'S ADVENTURE WITH GUERRILLAS.

June 11th, 1863, as a bearer of special dispatches, I left New Orleans, accompanied by Captain Bell, of the Texan Rangers, for La Fourche, a distance of about sixty-three miles from the Crescent-city.

Some of Dick Taylor's cavalry had been making a raid along the line of the Opelousas railroad, tearing up the track and burning bridges wherever they could reach the railroad, by making a dash past our outposts, with any reasonable probability of a safe return. We were, therefore, unable to go by rail towards our destination more than thirty miles. There we left the track, and through the kindness of Colonel Darden were furnished two strong field horses to continue our journey. It was then about noon of the day on which we took our departure from New Orleans. The colonel, as we were about leaving him, placed in our hands a small map of the route we were to take, and said jocosely:

"Keep an eye to the front, gentlemen, for, as you are aware, the greybacks, like foxes, have holes, and are liable to creep out for any purpose but to give a friendly greeting to travelers in your uniform."

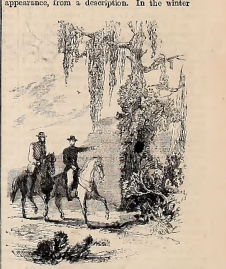
"Very true," says Captain Bell, "I have had some experience with such fellows, and I know what to expect from them if we fall into their hands."

"Well, says the colonel, laughing, "we won't anticipate your capture. Good-by. Make my regards to General Weitzel, and tell him we are apparently defenceless down this way."

I thought I discovered, as we shook the colonel's hand at parting an expression of solicitude on his countenance, which seemed to say,

"I am afraid those gentlemen do not realize the perils of their journey."

It made but little impression upon my mind at the time, but I had occasion to remember it before another sunrise.



For the first four or five miles our stout horses trotted along lazily over what had once been a highway, but was then almost an unbroken path. Before we left, the colonel pointed out to us a long line of cypress trees bordering an extensive swamp, the edge of which we were then entering. Neither of us were unused to traveling over the lonesome roads which traverse this country for miles without passing a human habitation.

As we entered the swamp the captain said:

"This is a dismal place—fit abode for a superannuated undertaker."

"You," said I, "with a very slight stretch of his imagination he could transform these blackened piles of rubbish into hearses, and this cypress moss into funeral plumes."

A person who has never traveled through a Louisiana swamp can hardly form an idea of their peculiarly mournful, desolate, and undreadding appearance, from a description. In the winter season they seem, as it were, to be alone—shut out from all the rest of the world by a leaden sky that hangs over them, as if it were a great lake and they at the bottom of it.

In summer the scene is only changed by the trees being in full foliage, and in place of the leaden sky, a blazing sun which seems to stupify every living thing, making vegetation droop and wither, and the leaves of the trees, which in a northern landscape form the greatest attraction, here combine with the drooping moss to make the scene only more dismal. It is a mystery to most travelers how, in a country where jubilance and ease seem to be the principal characteristics of the people, the herculean task of building roads through miles of almost impenetrable swamp should ever have been undertaken. Even the alligators, snakes and lizards, seem to be conscious, as they lie sunning themselves on the embankments, that their dominion will never be disturbed.

Our progress was much slower than we thought it would be, and the sun had sunk low in the horizon before we had completed our nineteenth mile. In the most favorable weather we could scarcely have had more than an hour and a half of daylight before us, but the sky thickening with clouds, sudden puffs of cold air, peculiar to marshy ground, and the low whistle of the wind through the trees, gave us a warning that darkness and a storm were rapidly approaching. There was a slight expression of anxiety depicted upon the countenance of my companion, as he drew from his pocket the map the colonel had given us, and carefully dotted the different landmarks with a view to determine our exact whereabouts. After carefully examining our route, the captain turned to me, saying:

"I confess I am a little disappointed; we ought to have been, by this time, within sight of Riley's clearing, and if I am right in my calculation, we are at least ten miles from there. Confound these infernal corduroy roads! it would puzzle a shrewd man to tell just how much ground one is getting over."

"Well, captain," I replied, "my eyes are suddenly opened to the fact that we have got more to do, to get through to camp, than it is pleasant to undertake at this time in the evening."

"I should rather think so," said the captain. "What is to be done? We, like stupid fellows, have been riding along for the last six hours, taking no note of time, and now we find ourselves in a fix, with a little more than an hour of daylight to get out of it."

The captain had hardly finished his sentence, when we heard a voice crying with bated breath:

"Hist! I say dar."

We involuntarily halted our horses, and listened for a repetition of the sound. The voice again exclaimed:

"You fellows with blue coats hadn't better be gwine much furder or you're gone dead."

We were both puzzled to determine the whereabouts of the mysterious individual who had volunteered to give us warning of danger. The captain had lived too long on the borders to parley.

Pausing a moment in a listening attitude the captain called out:

"Who are you, and where are you?"

"Here I is, massa."

"Where is here?" says the captain.

"In dis tree—don't yer see me?"

We both looked anxiously in the direction whence the voice proceeded, and after the most careful scrutiny discovered a negro seated on the branch of a tree, almost hidden by the foliage. As soon as the negro perceived that we had discovered his whereabouts, he beckoned us to leave the road, where he could converse with us more safely.

The captain, turning to me, said:

"What do you think this means?"

"I think," I replied, "he has some information to impart which may be of interest to us. I can hardly imagine any other motive that could have induced him to discover himself."

"How is the bottom, my boy?" said the captain, addressing the negro, referring to the ground off the road.

"There aint no bottom where you is, massa. Go up de road to dat ar broke log, and if you ar putty kurful, you kin git up to dis tree wid yer horses."

The tree on which the negro was perched was between seven and eight rods from the road, and apparently inaccessible. We determined, however, to venture through, according to the negro's directions. The captain, taking the lead, was too careful a horseman to trust his steed where he was not willing to go himself, and, springing from his saddle, approached the log indicated by the negro as the best place to enter the swamp, and cautiously feeling his way, determined that the ground was strong enough to bear the horse. I remained seated, and slowly followed my companion as he pushed carefully through the thick undergrowth, until we reached a point where we could converse freely with the negro, who, when he saw we were within a few feet of the tree, descended and crept up to us. There was no mistaking him, he was a genuine Louisiana field-hand, with a frank, expressive countenance, indicating more intelligence than is usually displayed by that class of negroes.

"Well?" said the captain. "Out with it! Let us know what brought you here, and why you brought us here."

"Massa, ain't you cum o' Linkum's sogers?"

"Yes," I answered; "what of that?"

"Case thar ain't enough uv yer."

"Enough of us for what?" says the captain.

"Enough to go on this road much furder widout gettin' killed."

"What do you mean?" said the captain.

"Yer see, massa, I is one of de men dat belong to Massa Sheldon, who owns de plantation about two miles from har. Dis mornin', 'fore daylight, dar was 'bout twenty uv dem villans come 'long, and sed massa was a Linkum man, and dey tuk him off, and I spec dey killed him. Dey want gone mor'n two, tree hours, when dey cum back, and dey played smash wid ebery ting in de house. Dey set fire to de sugar-mill, and sed dey was gwine to take ebery band along wid em. Dey sent me down in ter de grass field to fetch up de mules; but dis child didn't fetch em up, he fotched hisself inter de woods, and har he ha."

"Well, how do you know they are there now?" said the captain.

"Kase I heard one of em say dey reckon day'd hang out dar for a night."

Scarcely had the negro finished his last sentence when the storm, unheeded by us during this conversation, came upon us in such fury as to make a place of shelter our first consideration. Almost simultaneous with the bursting of the storm, it grew suddenly dark, and the blackness of midnight surrounded us.

"We are in for it," said the captain, as a vivid flash of lightning, followed by a deafening roar of thunder, made the ground tremble beneath our feet.

"Yes," I replied, "that is very evident. How are we to get out of it?"

"That is a question I'm not able to answer. What do you say?" said the captain, turning to the negro, who was invisible to us, except in the flashes of lightning.

"Reckon we can't stay here all night, massa, if it keeps on rainin' like dis yere. It'll drown us out 'fore mornin'; de bayou is bery onsartin when it gets full o' water. Yer can't see nothin' uv dis swamp—only de tree tops when de levee brakes."

"That's rather unpleasant information," said I. "The sooner we change our quarters the better."

"What direction shall we take?" said the captain. "Had we not just left the road, and did I not know in what direction it lies, I do not think, if my life depended upon it, I could reach it."

The negro, who had been standing passively by, apparently indifferent to what was being said, suddenly exclaimed:

"Massa, I knows ebery foot uv dis yer ground, and I can go straight home de darkest night dat eber grew. On de ole plantation dar is a cabin, mor'n a mile back from de road, and taint a great deal mor'n two miles from here. Dar ain't nobody dar, and dar ain't nothin' in de place 'cept some black moss. If yer want to go dar, dis chile will take yer to de spot."

"Certainly," we replied, knowing that any change would be for the better.

"Lead the way, my boy," said the captain; "we shall have to trust you to guide us safely through."

"Let dis yer indiwidual alone for dat. Reckon we better keep de road for 'bout a mile furder, den we can go inter de swamp till we get to de cane fields; after dat it'll be mighty easy gettin' in de ole cabin."

Following the negro's advice, we, with great difficulty, regained the road, where the captain mounted his horse, and following the sound of the negro's feet as they splashed through the water, the lightning occasionally favoring us with a glimpse of him and the road, we groped on towards our prospective shelter. I had witnessed hurricanes at sea and storms in the tropics, but never saw anything equal in violence to the storm that surrounded us. So violent was the wind that the largest trees were prostrated on the road, and those that were sufficiently strong to withstand the blast were stripped of their leaves and smaller branches, which came whistling in our faces. Not a word was spoken by any of the party as we journeyed on; in fact, had we been disposed to converse, the mad roar of the elements would have made it impossible. We had gone about three quarters of a mile, and I had just drawn a tighter rein on my steed for fear of accident, when a flash of lightning discovered to us five armed men, seated on a tree, that had fallen across the road. Almost as instantaneously as the flash of lightning came the report of a musket, and the ball whizzed past between myself and my companion. In an instant, impelled by a sense of danger, the negro caught the bridles of our horses, and before we were conscious of his intentions, we were floundering in the swamp, completely hid from the road. Never did I more fervently pray for anything than that the storm would continue, but that the lightning would cease to flash. We had not gone two horses' lengths before the animals struck a spongy piece of ground, almost as soft as a carpet, sufficiently strong to bear our weight. Here we paused, and as the storm lulled for an instant, we could distinctly hear the voices of the men in the road. Two or three of them were evidently arguing that the man who fired the shot saw nothing.

"I tell you, Jake," said one of them, "you was dreaming."

"Dreaming!" replied the individual addressed; "a sloth could not sleep on such a night as this."

"Take it, you're right, Jake. What did you see?"

"See! I saw two men on horseback, and a nigger."

"That's a likely story," growled a voice.

"Well, maybe you are all smarter than I am; but you wait until the next flash, and if you do not see somebody in that road, my name is not Jake Martin."

The words were hardly spoken when a vivid flash lit up the scene, revealing for an instant every surrounding object. The party had evidently seized upon the moment to carefully scan the road, and with the darkness came laughs and jeers at Jake.

"Didn't you see six men and two niggers this time, old blunderhead?"

"No; I saw nothing this time," said the disappointed Jake, growing mad at the taunts of his companions. Springing from his seat, he exclaimed, with an oath:

"Any one of this party that says I didn't see two men and a nigger five minutes ago on that road is a liar!"

From this speech, and the quiet that for a moment ensued, it was evident, regardless of their former jeer at Jake, that he was a man whom, once roused to anger, the party stood in fear of.

"I did not doubt your word," said one of the men, in a conciliatory tone; "I only thought it rather queer that four men, with their eyes open, didn't see what you saw."

"Of course, if you saw them," said another, "they can't be out of musket range, for to go a rod in any part of the swamp around here is an hour's work; we've got plenty of ammunition, boys, let us give them a volley at every point of the compass."

"All right," was the general response. "Which way shall we fire first?" exclaimed one.

"In the swamp, to the right," said Jake, in a half-grumbling, half-satisfied tone.

Immediately five muskets were discharged into the swamp, directly across the road from us. In a minute the guns were reloaded and fired at a sharp angle from us, and we knew that the next discharge would place us in imminent danger. Up to this time we had remained motionless, lest their attention should be attracted to us, but now it was very evident something must be done. Leaning over my saddle bow, I whispered to the captain that we must make a move in some direction, or be slaughtered in our tracks.

"Is there any chance of getting through to the cleared fields?" inquired the captain of the negro, who stood half-paralyzed with fear at his side.

"I reckon so," replied our sable friend, apparently hardly conscious of what he was saying.

"Well, take the reins of my horse, and go on as though a fiend were after you," and, said the captain, turning to me, "if you'll bring up the rear guard, we'll give these fellows a race."

Although our conversation had been carried on in the lowest tone, it must have attracted the attention of the party in the road, for they ceased firing to listen. So certain seemed our capture, that I became almost desperately indifferent to danger. In a blind swamp, almost impassable by daylight, guided only by a frightened negro, and within easy range of the muskets of a band of ruffians, there seemed to be but little hope of escape.

The first plunge of the captain's horse settled the matter in the minds of the party in the road. They knew our position, and now came the struggle for life. They discharged their pieces, the balls cutting through the branches over our heads. A yell and a crash through the bush followed. Jake was right. They knew how many there were of us, and they anticipated an easy prey. Our horses were of but little service to us, and we should have abandoned them had we not known that we could fight better upon their backs than upon the ground.

Although our pursuers could make but little headway, we were slower than they. So eager were they for our capture, that they did not stop to load their muskets.

I was almost abreast the captain, when, with a sudden plunge, my horse sank in the mud, nearly to his haunches. That instant three of the party were upon us—one of them not more than a yard from me. I had held my revolver in my hand from the time they commenced our pursuit. The lightning again revealed us, and the foremost villain made a dash for me.

As he sprang to grasp my right arm, I raised my pistol, but the cap snapped. I had seen in the flash that he had thrown his musket away, and was armed only with a knife. With one bound he reached my horse's back, and before I could turn to face him, he had me by the throat. I could not see, but I knew his knife was raised. I threw up my arm for protection. The villain struck, but by good fortune a limb was between me and the knife, and the blade was buried deep in the wood. Before he could recover it, my revolver was again cocked and at his breast. This time my pistol did not fail me, and the assaulting party numbered one less. At this point the lightning became our friend. By its constant flash we could determine the position of our assailants.

The captain was a sure shot. Aiming at the one nearest to us, he discharged his pistol, and the man fell. The remaining three were only made the more desperate by the loss of their companions. They rushed upon us like maddened demons. My horse had extricated himself from the mud, and was moving slowly on when I was the second time attacked, and by a more wily antagonist than the first. He knew that I was armed with a pistol, and that he must do his work with a sword. He could approach me only in the darkness, and in a flash would jump so suddenly as to prevent me from aiming accurately. Twice I fired, but missed him. With a sudden bound he caught my pistol arm and dragged me from the saddle. I found myself in a grasp of iron; I knew from a curse he uttered, that it was Jake. My only hope was in preventing him from using his weapon, and with the strength of desperation with my free hand I seized his arm in time to prevent a thrust aimed at my heart. The struggle, I knew would be a short one, for I was conscious that my strength was not equal to his. He was gradually bearing down my arm, when a momentary glare of lightning discovered to me the negro with a huge club in his hand. The next instant a heavy blow was struck, and the ruffian sank lifeless to the ground. The negro had brained him with the club. Once more released, I sprang to the assistance of the captain, who, I knew from the sound, was in deadly conflict with the two remaining desperadoes. My assistance was not required, for before I reached the captain, he had disabled one of them, and the other, seeing that there was no longer a chance for him, made good his escape.

Fortunately, neither of us were injured in the affray. The negro had acquired extraordinary courage by our success, and as we determined not to again try the road, resolutely struck out for the place of our destination.

The storm had abated but little; still the great danger we had passed made it of minor importance, and in less than two hours we succeeded in gaining the open fields, and soon after, the cabin we had passed through so much peril to reach. As well as we could determine in the dark the building we were about entering seemed to have been rudely thrown together to meet some emergency. Whether it was constructed for a dwelling or a barn, could not be easily decided, for it was about as fit for one purpose as the other. It contained one large square room and a garret, the floor of which was laid with loose boards, which formed the ceiling of the room below. The garret was reached by a ladder, and as the negro informed us, it was partially filled with cypress moss, we concluded it would be the most comfortable place to spend the remaining portion of the night. The cabin was but a short distance from the woods, and out of view of any habitation.

We had been in the building about an hour, and the negro had fallen asleep, when we were startled by a clattering of horses' feet, and voices at the door.

"I wonder what's up now?" whispered the captain.

"Anything but a serenade, I'll be bound," replied I, mechanically, as the thought of new danger presented itself.

"Who has got a match?" exclaimed a gruff voice at the door, as three or four men entered the room below.

"Here you are, captain," was the reply of one of the party.

Almost immediately a light was struck, and the men, evidently familiar with the locality, commenced piling pine knots in a rudely constructed fireplace in one corner of the room. A bright blaze soon revealed to us, through the cracks of the floor upon which we were lying, the countenances of the party.

Seven more villainous-looking men I never saw. The man addressed as captain was a dark-visaged, long-haired, round-shouldered individual, apparently about thirty-five years of age. While the party were drying their wet clothes by the fire which was kindled for that purpose, the captain said to one of his men:

"Bring in the prisoner. We can't afford to let him die a natural death, and if he stays out there much longer strapped on that mule's back, he will be drowned in the rain."

At this command three of the men went out of the door and soon returned, half-dragging and half-carrying a young Union officer, who seemed to be almost speechless and exhausted. We soon learned from their conversation that he was captured in a raid made by the party through our lines, and the object of the capture was to gratify the personal malignity of the captain, who had, on some former occasion, been himself a prisoner in the charge of the captured officer. When the prisoner was brought in he was partially unbound, and soon recovered his consciousness. The captain, observing this, remarked to him that he must manage to save strength enough to appreciate hanging, for it was their intention to do him that honor at sunrise.

"We've no time to build a gallows for you; your carcase, in less than three hours, will be swinging from a beam over your head. This is a little compliment that I promised to make you, if you ever fell into my hands. The only difference between you and me is, that I managed to escape from your clutches," said the captain, with a frightful oath; "but you'll not get out of mine, rest assured of that, my blue daisy."

"But you cannot intend to murder me?" exclaimed the prisoner.

"That's a matter of opinion," returned the captain. "If the rope is short enough you will probably not touch the ground for several hours after you have commenced to stretch it."

This last expression could hardly have been said in a more sneering and brutal manner. The young man, apparently satisfied that any remonstrance from him was useless, made no reply, and the captain, after giving some orders to his men concerning the guarding of the prisoner, composed himself to sleep.

All this time our thoughts had not been idle. Each one of us were planning some means of rescuing the prisoner and effecting our own escape. The negro had awoke, and fortunately realized our position. It was necessary to act quickly, and noiselessly reloading our revolvers, we soon decided upon a plan of action. Fortunately the loud and blasphemous conversation of the ruffians below prevented them from hearing the few whispers that passed between us. We knew that the guerrillas had their horses tied to trees near the building, and that our first object was for one of us to reach the outside, and, after securing the best horse near our own, quietly turn the others loose in the woods. We would then shape our actions according to the best means at our disposal for the surprise of the party below. The building was so low that we could easily reach the ground from the small window of the garret. By this means we could easily effect our own escape unobserved, but we were determined to rescue the prisoner. We concluded to trust the negro to remove the horses and securely fasten the door on the outside, while we were watching for a favorable moment to fire on the villains below.

This plan, although feasible, depended, for its successful development, entirely upon favorable circumstances. In about an hour after we had decided upon our course of action, the fire had almost entirely died out, leaving objects in the room barely discernable. We knew the exact position of every man, and could make no mistake in our aim when the time came for us to fire upon them. Five of the guerrillas had already fallen asleep, leaving the other two to guard the prisoner. This appeared to be the time for action. The negro was now all nerve; a cat could not have more stealthily approached the window or more quietly leapt to the ground. We knew that his work would be done; we, knowing the occasion of the slight noises outside, were alive to every movement. Almost breathlessly we listened to the negro as he was removing the horses, which he did one by one, quietly leading them into the woods. That done, we heard him approach the door, and, with rails from the fence, securely fasten it, after which, by the assistance of a piece of timber, he succeeded in regaining the window. On entering the room we stationed him at the ladder by which we entered the garret, and prepared ourselves for the assault. In some places the apertures in the floor were sufficiently large to command the entire range of the room below, and each of us selecting a favorable position, we decided to shoot the guard first. It was the work of an instant; our aim was sure, and the men fell without a struggle. In the confusion, the yells, and the storm of rage that followed, two more ruffians were shot before they knew where our fire came from. We immediately changed our position, knowing that they would shoot through the floor, in the direction of the flash of our pistols. The three remaining villains dashed wildly to the door, and, finding it barred, they sprang for the ladder; but, before the leader of the gang had ascended three rounds, our faithful pistols did their work, and he fell dead at the feet of his companions. The other two, not knowing our numbers, cried for quarter, and surrendered themselves.

We descended the ladder and quickly secured them. Releasing the prisoner, and driving the captured guerrillas before us, we reached General Weitzel's lines in safety before the sun was an hour high. And thus ended our adventures with the guerrillas.

REST, SOLDIER OF THE UNION, REST!

BY EDWARD C. RIGGS.

Rest, soldier of the Union, rest!
The brave heart, that, within thy breast,
Beat proudly where our flag did wave,
Is silent now within the grave,
Where, safe from war's appalling storm,
Serenely sleeps thy manly form;
And summer flowers in peace shall bloom
Upon the sod that decks thy tomb.
No battle sound can there molest—
Rest, soldier of the Union, rest!

Firm didst thou stand amid the shock
Of charging squadrons—firm as rock—
Until, while giving blow for blow,
A rebel bullet laid thee low,
Wounded and bleeding on the sod
Already wet with patriot blood;
While o'er the field there came the cheers
Of victory, to greet thine ears.
Green grows the turf above thy breast—
Rest, soldier of the Union, rest!

Borne from the strife by comrades dear,
Fierce agony could wring no tear
From thee—nor uttered then a groan—
Till in the hospital alone,
And sleeping on thy couch of death,
Tears slowly came as came thy breath;
For, in thy dream, thy thoughts did roam
To where thy mother wept at home.
In peaceful spheres, where dwell the blest,
Rest, soldier of the Union, rest!

THE MAGIC RING.

BY LIZZIE CAMPBELL.

Jacob Van Anseller sat alone in his handsome room in his handsome house, and occupied himself in thinking over the handsome bargain he had made that day.

Marie Thompson was a pretty, fair-haired girl, with frank, hazel eyes, and a complexion setting at defiance all comparisons of pearls and roses. Mr. Van Anseller, a wealthy wine merchant, had seen her about two months before the opening of this story; and being in want of a wife he selected Marie to fill that situation in his household. The poor girl was not overwhelmed with joy at the prospect of this honor—indeed she obstinately refused to become Mrs. Jacob Van Anseller, and called down on herself the displeasure of her father, a narrow-minded, very poor tradesman, who owed some money to the wealthy lover. Mr. Thompson neither could nor would approve his daughter's refusal of this golden alliance; and when she could give no better excuse for what she had done than the declaration that she did not nor ever could love Mr. Van Anseller, her father "pooh, poohed"—declared he would "hear no such nonsense," and bade her make up her mind to become Mrs. Van Anseller within a month.

With so powerful a friend at court, the wine merchant did not despair, and the consequence was that poor little Marie, very pale, and nervous, and tearful, gave her promise to marry Mr. Van Anseller just one week before the conclusion of that spoken of by her father.

"True, she doesn't love me!" mused the wealthy bridegroom-elect in his handsome room, that evening, after the bill of sale had been finally arranged between himself and his prospective father-in-law. "But what is love? A fable—a girl's dream—a boy's madness! She will be a good little housekeeper, and how pretty she'll look behind the tea-urn at my handsome table. Pooh! Love, indeed! Stuff and nonsense!"

Mr. Van Anseller mused a while longer, but his thoughts took no definite shape; and after a while he slipped his fingers into his waistcoat pocket and drew out a ring, a broad, heavy band of plain gold—evidently a wedding ring. He looked at it for some moments, put it back into his pocket again, and with a sigh of satisfaction dismissed Marie, ring, marriage, and all appertaining thereto, from his mind.

The wedding-day came, and Marie, more tearful, more pale, and more nervous than when she had given the fatal promise, faltered the affirmatives that made her a wife, and Mr. Van Anseller slipped the heavy band of yellow gold on her slender finger. As soon as they were alone he took her hand, and, pointing to the ring, delivered a short address, somewhat as follows:

"Marie, this ring has been the sign of union between my ancestors for more than three hundred years; and woe to the wife that dishonors it! It is made of a gold that will not brook alloy, and its darkening hue reveals every thought of the wife who forgets that she is wearing it. Remember! I shall see the first shade that tarnishes its brightness, though to your eyes it may glitter with all its customary brilliance.

Marie shuddered and snatched away her hand from her husband's grasp, feeling the ring scorch her finger as though it were already burning with some magic fire.

The wedding tour of Mr. and Mrs. Van Anseller was not an extensive one; the wine merchant knew the value of time, and at the end of the first week in the honeymoon Marie was formally installed in the large fine house over which she was henceforth to be mistress. She was not so unhappy as she had at first feared she would be; her husband was neither harsh nor cruel; and if he did not show her any of the tenderness and thoughtful devotion which young wives naturally expect, neither did he play the tyrant nor constrain the action of her free thoughts. She did not love him—she could not love him; but she began to have a certain dim, friendly regard for him, and her heart, being free, gave her no uneasiness; her husband, she thought, was a good sort of man according to his lights, and if these lights were not very brilliant, perchance he was not to blame, and wouldn't she be ungrateful to think he was?

Six months passed away in this negative manner, which Marie would not have known whether to describe as happy or wretched. One evening Mr. Van Anseller announced, at the dinner-table, that a nephew of his own, just returned from a European tour, was coming to spend some weeks with him; "and, Marie, I hope you will do all you can to make his uncle's house agreeable to him," he concluded.

"Certainly, sir," responded Marie, with much the same tone and the same instinct of obedience with which she used to receive her father's commands, and, Mr. Van Anseller being apparently quite satisfied, no more was said on the subject.

On the morrow Franz Nurrenberg arrived; and Marie received him with even more cordiality than, in accordance with her husband's desires, she had determined on. The young traveler was of a most attractive and prepossessing appearance, and it would have been hard for a much older and sterner heart than Marie's, to have refused the welcome which his fair, handsome face, his bright face and blue eyes imperatively demanded.

Mr. Van Anseller seemed equally well pleased with his charming nephew—quite proud of him indeed, and smiled quite graciously at Marie's praises and admiration of him.

"Yes," he said, "the young dog! He's a handsome lad, and the living picture of his poor mother, my only sister. All the Van Ansellers are handsome."

Marie made no answer to this somewhat incredible statement; but, surveying her husband for a moment, wondered in her heart if it was the fate of the handsome Van Ansellers to lose all traces of their hereditary beauty with the coming years? Could Franz ever look, ten, twenty, thirty years hence, as his uncle Jacob looked? Impossible—impossible!

She turned away from her contemplation of his uncle Jacob with a feeling somewhat akin to disgust, and leaving him to his after-dinner nap, glided down to the parlor, where Franz was sitting by the grand piano, softly playing wild, plaintive German airs, and now and then joining to their sweet sighing the music of his voice, in strange, weird words, that filled Marie with a vague wonder, delight and terror.

Franz was an accomplished musician, and his voice was singularly sweet and pleasing; and when his beautiful young aunt expressed pleasure and admiration at his performance, he exerted himself to do his best. This musical entertainment after dinner, and while her husband slept upstairs, was a great, an exquisite, and most dangerous pleasure to Marie; and as day after day went by, she found that all the hours, from the moment she rose in the morning, were dreary, heavy, and inexpressibly dull till that magic time, when dessert was placed upon the table and Mr. Van Anseller began to nod and doze, and murmur brokenly in the first stages of sleep.

The evenings in the parlor were not all given to music now. Franz recounted his travels in foreign lands, and Marie had learned to think the low tones of his voice, in those half-whispered conversations, when he generally sat on the ottoman, at her feet, and held her hand in his—were they not aunt and nephew?—more sweet than his wildest, most plaintive songs. Nearly every night now her feverish sleep was broken into by strange visions of the handsome blue-eyed nephew of her husband; in dreams her lips touched his; her hand smoothed the waves of his golden hair; and with many a nervous start she awoke to shudder at the thoughts she obstinately closed her waking mind against.

"Franz will be leaving us soon, Marie," said Mr. Van Anseller, one afternoon, a little before the dinner-hour—the dinner, in fact, being delayed in consequence of Mr. Nunenberg's non-appearance.

Marie had started violently, and grown deadly pale at the abrupt announcement, but her husband had not seen these evidences of her emotion, for his face was turned away. He repeated again:

"Yes, Franz will leave us soon, and I'm sure we will both miss him; I will certainly. Will you, Marie?"

Marie made no answer, and Mr. Van Anseller, having waited some minutes, turned towards her impatiently.

She did not seem to have heard one word he had been saying, her head lay wearily against the back of the chair, her face was perfectly colorless—marble-pale, and her eyes were closed in a sort of mute despair. One small hand clutched the arm of the chair, and the other hung listless by her side. Mr. Van Anseller was unpleasantly shocked, almost alarmed; and he had risen and made one step toward the bell-rope, when he stopped suddenly. An awful frown gathered on his brow, and his eyes glared wickedly from beneath his bushy brows—glared, and were fixed with the blasting fire of lightning on the slender, white hand holding the arm of the chair in its tightest grasp.

He made but one stride and reached the chair, and clutching his wife by the arm, raised her with a jerk to her feet. Marie met his wild gaze with a sort of maddened horror in her own. She had cried out at first, for his hold on her arm hurt her; after that, his hold tightening and growing more painful, she shuddered away from him, and moaned drearily?

"What does this mean?" he asked, in a voice husky with rage.

"What?" murmured Marie, plaintively, and following the direction of his gaze.

"That—the ring is growing dark, and darker—it will soon be black."

Marie uttered an inarticulated cry, and wrenching herself from his grasp, struck with her other hand the marriage ring on her finger, as though she would have struck off thus the fetters that bound her to him.

"I never loved you—I never pretended to love you—and now I hate you!" she said fiercely, and turned haughtily away, to meet the blue eyes of Franz Nunenberg, standing on the threshold, and regarding her with a look of pitying tenderness that was as a healing balm to her sore and wounded heart.

Mr. Van Anseller saw his nephew too; and uncertain how much of the scene just past he had witnessed, desired him somewhat gruffly to enter.

The spasm of jealousy which had almost led Mr. Jacob Van Anseller to strike his wife did not interfere with his after-dinner nap; though it is impossible to say how sound that slumber might have been could he have suspected that his rival had sat, during dinner time, directly opposite him, and at the first sign of approaching somnolence, had descended to the parlor with his wife.

Marie felt that a dreadful crisis had arrived; the full extent of her mad passion for her husband's nephew she had never guessed till the moment in which she learned that he was so soon to leave them, but now that she realized it in all its terror—in all its magnitude—it took possession of her and carried her heart, her conscience, her soul away, in the resistless whirlwind of its might.

"Then you will leave me, Franz?" were her first words when they were alone.

"Never!" and he clasped both her hands in his, answering the love he had long since read in her eyes. "Never—death alone shall separate me from you. Did he strike you, Marie?"

"No," and she shivered, "but he will—he will kill me, Franz."

"He is capable of it, but you will never see him again. Go, and return to me at once, for within this hour you must leave him for ever. This is no time for words, or for scruples. Go, dearest—not a minute is to be lost," and pushing her gently towards the door, he released her hands, and as he did so, the ring, broken in two fell on the floor between them.

"Heaven be merciful!" ejaculated Marie. "It s an awful omen."

"It is a happy omen!" exclaimed her lover with a triumphant smile. "You are free from the chains he would have bound your soul and body in; it was old and worthless," he continued, picking up the pieces of the ring; "it was much worn, mended in many places, but it has done duty for the last time. How close I must have held your hands, my darling—so close to my heart I will guard you while I live, and so I haul from you every memory of past misery;" and as he spoke, he cast the broken pieces of dark gold contemptuously from him, while Marie, re-assured and with a smile, hastened to her room, and as hastily returned, cloaked, hooded, and veiled.

* * * * * *

Neither Marie nor her lover heeded the dreadful storm of that night; in vain did drenching rain, and roar of thunder, and glare of lightning, seek to delay their wicked flight. They had already passed the fields and meadows surrounding the wine merchant's handsome country house; and had entered the little wood, beyond which the lights of the station-house glimmered, and the shriek of the coming locomotive sounded above the storm.

The rain poured in thick streams through the leaves and branches—the lightning flamed, blazed, and disappeared, and the quick peals of thunder seemed to shake the very ground on which they trod. A flash—a roar—a crash—a wild cry! And on the morrow, under the smiling blue sky, and the gay, bright sunlight, it was hard to recognise the blackened, seared corpses that were dragged from beneath the trunk of the splintered oak, as the bodies of Marie Van Anseller and Franz Nunenberg.

THE CHICARRA, OR ANIMAL PLANT, OF MEXICO.

One of the most curious entomological objects which has attracted the attention of naturalists traveling in Mexico is the curious insect of which the Indians, in the neighborhood of Santiago and Cantla call chicarra, and which is sometimes called the animal plant. It is so called from a peculiar excrescence starting from the head of the insect, the nature of which has given rise to much discussion. Some maintain that it is purely an animal product, supplied from the insect itself; others that it is a true plant, or vegetable substance, starting from the brain of the insect. The hypotheses are both wrong. The insect is a kind of grasshopper (cicada plebeia), in its larva state, and the excrescence which it bears, resembling a miniature branch of coral, is a vegetable parasite, a kind of fungus or mushroom called by the botanists Hill and Watson sphæria et torrubia sobolifera. This is certainly a curious and interesting kind of parasite, but by no means singular in the history of the cryptogamia. Nearly all the mushrooms are parasites—that is to say, such as are developed on other organized bodies. Some attack or start from plants, others from animals. Numerous examples might be quoted in illustration of this point. It is probable that, after being hatched from the egg, the larva of the grasshopper quits its cradle in the earth and seeks escape to the surface; the parasite in question, in the condition of a germ, becomes attached to its head and takes root there, as any ordinary vegetable in the soil. After transformation, this excrescence falls off, and the fully developed insect appears as in the third figure in our engraving.

HICHARRA, OR ANIMAL-PLANT, OF MEXICO.

AN ARMY IN MOTION.

Few persons have an idea of the appearance of an army in motion. The last number of the United Service Gazette supplies some statistics which will give the reader an idea of a large army:

In the campaign of the past summer, the army of the Potomac, as near as we can arrive at the figures, appears to have numbered ordinarily about 120,000 effective fighting men. Its transportation is reported to have consisted of about 4,200 wagons, 800 ambulances, 30,000 artillery, cavalry, ambulance and draught horses, 4,500 private horses, and 22,000 mules, making an aggregate of 50,000 animals. This is just about one-third animals to the men, about the same ratio as obtained during the Peninsular campaign and ever since, whereas the ratio among western armies, during the same time, and always, has usually been one-half, and generally, very nearly two-thirds animal to the men. The figures in Gen. Sherman's combined army during the Atlantic campaign, footed up generally about as follows: 100,000 effective fighting men, 6,300 wagons, 900 ambulances, 32,000 artillery, cavalry, ambulance and draught horses, 4,500 private horses, and 36,000 mules, making an aggregate in all of some 72,000 animals. These figures are simply enormous, and will give the reader some slight conception of what an army really is, if he will but consider them for a moment. For example, an army of 125,000 men, marching in column or four abreast, and the intervals but six feet apart, which is less than the usual interval of troops on the march, would extend over a distance of 35 miles, without making any allowance for the usual intervals between regiments, brigades, divisions and army corps. So with the wagons. On good roads where trains are kept well closed, it is calculated that each six-mule team will occupy on an average, about 60 lineal feet; this would give about 90 teams to the mile, a large average on most marches, so that 6,300 teams would ordinarily require about 70 miles. If the weather or roads are bad, of course they will straggle along indefinitely, and thus require much more. An ambulance, on the march, usually occupies about 40 feet, so that 900 ambulances would occupy a distance of about seven miles. So with the artillery of an army of 125,000 men, it will usually have at least two guns to a 1,000 men, which would make 250 guns, or say, 40 batteries of six pieces each. Now, a battery on the march, as a general thing, will occupy full 300 yards, so that 40 batteries alone would take about seven miles. These figures, thus roughly taken, foot up 100 miles, as the free and easy marching distance of an army of the size of the great ones that we have had operating east and west during the past campaign; and this, too, without counting in accurately our Bedouin Arabs, the cavalry that always swarm along for miles together, beside, in apparently almost interminable columns. Of course, no general with a moderate stock of brains, would ever think of marching his troops thus in one continuous line, and hence the necessity of parallel roads in moving an army to keep your troops massed well in hands.

Two Important Questions.—Stopping for a day or two at a short way from Boston, Jeemes went to a barber's to get shaved. On entering and casting his eye about the room, he perceived that the barber drove a double trade of tonsor and small grocer.

"Shave, sir?" said the barber to his customer, whose face sufficiently indicated the object of his visit.

Jeemes made no reply, but drawing himself up to a lofty height, proceeded, in the attorney's fashion, to interrogate the barber, as follows:

"Sir, you are a barber?"

"Yes, sir; have a shave?"

"And you you also keep this oyster cellar?"

"Yes, sir; have any oysters?"

"Well, sir, this occupation of yours gives rise to the most horrible suspicions. It is a serious thing to submit one's head to the manipulations of a stranger; but if you can answer me a couple of questions to my satisfaction, I should like to be shaved."

The barber said he would try.

"Well, sir," said Jeemes solemnly, "do you shave with the oyster-knife?"

"No, sir," said the barber, smiling.

"One question more," continued the interrogator, "and remember that you are under oath—or, rather, recollect that this is a serious business."

The barber started.

"One question more. Do you never open oysters with your razor?"

"No—sir!" exclaimed the barber indignantly, amid a roar of laughter from the bystanders.

"Then shave me," said Jeemes, throwing himself into a chair, and untying his neckcloth with the air of a man who has unshaken confidence in human nature.

The Effect of Trade on the Condition of Mankind.—It is the interchange of the products of one region for those of another which has had, on the whole, the greatest influence on the human race. Think, for an instant, of the transfer of the potato from America to Europe; of maize to Asia; of the far more ancient introduction of wheat and rice from Asia into Europe; and not these alone, but almost all the fruits. Think of the carrying from Asia to America, and, in fact, to all tropical lands, such products as sugar, coffee, cotton. Think, too, of the results of the search of gold, ivory, and the slaves in the interior Africa, and for gold in California and Australia, opening such immense districts in settlements. The search after platina has disclosed the most guarded recesses of the Cordilleras and the Ural chain; while the need of copper first gave us our knowledge of the great system of American lakes. Without the expeditions to secure the whale, the walrus and the seal, as well as the fur-bearing animals, the polar world would be still untraversed. The discovery of coal on a hundred shores otherwise unknown led to the settlement of man in colonies from India and China southward to the Antarctic continent, and northward to Nova Zembla, Spitzbergen, and Greenland.

New Heating Apparatus.—M. Pelon, of Paris, has invented a new heating apparatus adapted to the warming of railway carriages, which consists of a cone of wood, covered with hemp, and made to revolve with great speed within a hollow cone of copper. These are enclosed in a metallic vessel, through which air is passed, and becoming heated in the passage, is then conveyed to the carriage. Motion will be given to the wooden cone by one of the axles of the carriage, and the heated air will be admitted to the vehicle by an arrangement under the control of the passengers. M. Pelon asserts that large mills could be more cheaply warmed by his apparatus than by fires. In the meantime, and pending more extended trials, he exhibits a little machine which keeps chocolate hot.

Our Turn Must Come.—Generation after generation (says a fine writer) have felt as we now feel, and their lives were as active as our own. They passed like a vapor, while nature wore the same aspect of beauty as when her Creator commanded her to be. The world will have the same attractions for our offspring yet unborn, that she had once for us as children. Yet a little while and all will have happened. The throbbing heart will be stilled, and we shall be at rest. Our funeral will find its way, and prayers will be said, and we shall be left alone, in silence and darkness, for the worms. And it may be for a short time we shall be spoken of, but the things of life will creep in, and our names will soon be forgotten. Days will continue to move on, and laughter and song will be heard in the room in which we died; and the eyes that mourned for us will be dried, and glisten again with joy, and even our children will cease to think of us, and will not remember to lisp our names.

If you want to understand a subject, hear a man speak of it whose business it is. If you want to understand the man, hear him speak of something else.

THE GREAT ATLANTIC CABLE—COILING THE SHORE END OF THE CABLE IN THE TANKS PREVIOUS TO SHIPPING, AT W. T. HENLEY'S WORKS, NORTH WOOLWICH, ENGLAND.—FROM A SKETCH BY OUR SPECIAL ARTIST, MR. J. BECKER, ACCOMPANYING THE EXPEDITION.

THE GREAT ATLANTIC CABLE.

OUR present number contains several interesting sketches from our Special Artist in England, illustrating the progress of the great electrical event of the age, the result of which we may expect to hear in a few days.

One of our illustrations represents that most interesting moment when the shore end of the cable was being shipped. Our readers need nothing to convince them what a monster the Great Eastern is; but our correspondent says that, although it was blowing a gale, and it was dangerous to attempt to board the ship in a tug, she lay perfectly motionless, almost as steady as a rock in the ocean. It may give the reader some idea of the immense weight on board, when we inform him that it was over 27,000 tons. All the weights are stowed as low as possible, to counteract to the utmost the tendency which large ships have to roll. On the voyage round to Valentia both screw and paddles will be used, but during the laying of the cable only the screw, except on special occasions. The paddles, however, will be kept constantly under steam, so as to be ready at a moment's notice.

FULL SIZE DIAGRAM OF THE CABLE OF 1858.

There has been the greatest exclusiveness shown by the directors, only one of that influential body being allowed on board. Messrs. Canning, Clifford and Temple have absolute charge of the engineering department, and Mr. De Sante of the electrical. Professor Thompson, a man of great eminence in the profession, is to be the referee in case of any difference of opinion.

FULL SIZE DIAGRAM OF THE CABLE NOW BEING LAID.

The Great Eastern was expected to leave her moorings on the 15th July, and most probably would have Valentia about the 19th July. At the rate of six miles an hour, she would be due at Heart's Content on the 3d of August. We hope our next paper will chronicle and illustrate her arrival there, and the triumphant completion of the great undertaking.

No accomplishment is more necessary, or of greater benefit to oneself and others, than the cultivation of epistolary correspondence. Many friendships that might have lasted through life have been dissolved from the slightest of it—many advantages lost, and many means of usefulness put out of reach.

"THE LITTLE COFFIN WREATHED WITH FLOWERS."

BY MISS R. V. ROBERTS.

'Tis strange to note the dreary blank, the silence and the gloom,
The loss of but one baby life can cast upon a home,
When a tiny coffin, wreathed in flowers, is carried through the door,
And earth hath one child the less, heaven one angel more.

Many may deem it overwrought, who never had such grief;
To mourn with this impassioned love, over a life so brief,
But in a thousand saddened homes, a thousand mothers know
These anguished throes of yearning love—this depth of speechless woe.

Time stills the hours of passionate grief, and hungers for the lights of peace,
But oh! no length of time can hid a mother's sorrow cease;
Though clasped by other childish arms, caressed by others, still
That vacant place, beside her knee, none other e'er can fill.

And when, at night, the little ones their simple prayers have said,
And with a kiss she softly layeth each one within its bed;
Her heart, unsatisfied, will turn from every fond caress,
And long, if but for "just once more," the sweet lost lips to press.

But oh! still—still within her heart there is an "aching void,"
And the hope she hath in those who are left, is chastened and alloyed;
The home can never be the same to her it was before,
The little coffin wreathed with flowers, was carried through the door.

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

BY VANE HILTON AT JOHN.

CHAPTER XXII.—THE END OF A BAD LIFE.

THE gaming-saloon at Bevan's Hotel was brilliantly illuminated; the ratsle of the little ivory cubes, and the rustle of cards, as they were rapidly dealt out, proclaimed that the sport was progressing.

Few words were spoken by the excited players, who comprised men of every denomination—country squires, professional blacklegs from the metropolis, well-to-do farmers, shopmen, clerks, a few foreigners, and one member of the church, who endeavored to hide his white necktie and clerical suit beneath a long cloak.

Only a few privileged inhabitants of the place knew of the existence of this den of iniquity; and these, after passing through to the back of the hotel, were admitted, one by one, by a doorkeeper, upon giving a password.

Gideon Crawleigh was there, playing recklessly—cursing when he lost, shouting with exultation when fortune sided with him, and quarreling with his antagonist on the slightest grounds.

The person with whom he was playing écarté was a tall, elbow-faced man, whose beard, manner and conversation proclaimed him an American. He appeared to be much the luckier and more skilful player of the two, and persecuted his coolness of temper undisturbed through the whole of the evening, while Crawleigh, under the influence of drink and play, was almost mad with excitement.

"I shall win this game," cried Gideon, as he dealt the cards.

"I guess you won't," replied his antagonist, playing the king.

A fierce oath fell from Gideon Crawleigh's lips, as the American gathered up trick after trick; and he again ordered loudly hot.

"I calculate that makes twelve games I have won," remarked the Yankee; "consequently you owe me sixty pounds."

"Well, I'll play you another game—double or quits."

"All right!"

The cards were again shuffled and dealt, Crawleigh playing with more than usual carefulness.

But all in vain. He lost.

"That makes it just one hundred and twenty pounds," said the New Yorker.

"One hundred and twenty devils!"

"You lost, my friend."

"I don't know how you managed, but certainly you contrived to win the game."

"All fair."

"May-be; but it certainly is very strange that a man should win thirteen games one after the other."

"Hope you don't mean to say that I cheated you."

"I say it looks very odd."

The American rose from the table, merely remarking, "If you have any suspicions, you had better not play any more."

And then he walked away to another part of the room.

"Then you won't have another game?" asked Gideon Crawleigh, following him.

"Certainly not, if you think I play unfairly."

"Give me a chance of winning back my money."

"No; you doubt my honesty."

"You like to play a safe game, and go away with your money in your pocket!"

"I do!"

"Sneak!"

The blood rushed to the Yankee's face, but he said nothing.

"Cheat!"

The answer was a mouthful of tobacco juice in Gideon Crawleigh's face.

Crawleigh was no coward. He struck the stranger a heavy blow on the face.

The bright barrel of a pistol glittered in the gaslight; there was a loud report, and the room filled with smoke.

All started to their feet; and when the sulphurous vapor rolled away, Gideon Crawleigh was seen stretched on the floor in the midst of a pool of blood.

The man by whose hand he had fallen, was no longer visible.

With many curses on the unfortunate man's head, the landlord, assisted by some waiters, raised him up, and a surgeon was sent for.

"He must be put to bed immediately," said the man of medicine to the proprietor of the house; "I think he is dying."

"I have no bed to put him in," was the surly reply; "the lodges not many yards from here, he had best be removed to his own home."

It was done. He was laid on his bed; the tiny orifice in his chest, from which the blood slowly oozed, was plugged and bound up, but still the surgeon shook his head.

"The man is dying fast!" he said.

As those words fell upon Gideon Crawleigh's ear, he sat up in the bed, and tightly grasped the doctor's wrist.

"It is not true?" he cried; "I shall recover! I will not die!"

"You must not talk thus," rejoined the doctor. "You are in a very dangerous condition."

A puller crossed over the invalid's brow—a look of fear in his hollow eyes.

"If you have any friends you wish to see, it would be well to send for them," continued the surgeon.

"Friends! I have no friends!"

And he sank down upon his bed again with a groan, weak from the great loss of blood.

"Yet," he continued, after a few minutes pause, "there is some one I should very much like to see, if I am to die."

He paused again, hardly decided whether it would reveal the secret or let it perish with him.

At length, with the air of a man who had made up his mind, he continued:

"I mean Mrs. Freshfield, the widow, who lives in the little cottage on Thornton Heath. If any one would tell her I wish to see her on very important business, I have no doubt she would come at once."

The kind-hearted doctor was not long writing a short note to Mrs. Freshfield, stating that Gideon Crawleigh was on the point of death, and wished to see her.

Then, calling one of the idle crowd who had gathered about the place, he despatched him with the missive, and a promise of a reward if he returned with Mrs. Freshfield.

During the time the messenger was absent, the unhappy man stood about on his bed in extreme agony, cursing, raving about the important secret, and then entreating the doctor to save his life.

Many kind and soothing words did the kind-hearted surgeon whisper to his dying patient—words of consolation to the sinful soul, of hope for the wicked.

"It's no use preaching, doctor; cure me first and I will listen to your sermons afterwards," was Crawleigh's response.

And he fell into one of his swearing fits again. At length the messenger returned, and with him Mrs. Freshfield and her brother-in-law.

"You are come at last!" he cried, fixing his glaring eyes upon the party. "A little while longer, and the doctor tells me you would have been too late."

"Pray what do you want with me, Mr. Crawleigh?" asked the widow.

"I have something very important to tell you."

"What about?"

"About your son."

"My son!" exclaimed the widow.

"My nephew!" cried George Freshfield.

"Hal ha! ha!" cried Crawleigh. "You little thought that I knew anything about him!"

"Where is he? Where is he?"

"Dead!"

She put her handkerchief to her eyes, but drying up the tear that stood in its corner, she cried:

"I do not believe you. My brother-in-law will find him and bring him to me; but if you know where he is, for heaven's sake, tell me."

"I tell you he is dead—I saw him die!" he repeated. "Listen, and I will tell you:

"When I was about ten years of age, I was living with my father, one dark evening, when a knock was heard at the door. I opened it.

"A man, wrapped in a long cloak, was standing there, with a bundle in his arms.

"'Does Simon Crawleigh live here?' he asked.

"'He does,' was my reply.

"'Give him this,' said the stranger, placing the bundle in my arms, and walking rapidly away.

"I took the bundle to my father, who opened it. To our utmost astonishment, it contained a fine baby, apparently about three months old.

"My father immediately handed it to me, and started in pursuit of the stranger, who had left such a strange upon his hands.

"But the man was nowhere to be seen, and in spite of his inquiries, no one could be discovered either to the parentage of the child or the residence of the person who had left it at our house.

"A poor woman, who lived in the neighborhood, was sent for, and, for a trifling consideration, undertook the office of nurse.

"There was no mark of any description on the child's dress, and my father knew not whether it had even been baptized or not.

"And so the babe became part and parcel of our household, though we knew nothing of its origin till it had been with us about six months, when my father received a letter, bearing the Australian postmark, from a person, whom he afterwards discovered, was your husband, stating that the child was his son—that his name was Charles Freshfield, and that he would become entitled to a sum of money on arriving at the age of twenty-one.

"Certain documents, which would enable my father to put him in possession of his property, were also enclosed, together with a touching request from the father that he would be careful of the child.

"This injunction my father obeyed, and when he died, about ten years after, he left the child in my charge.

"Of the father, your husband, we heard nothing more.

"As I was now in possession of the papers which had been deposited in my father's care, I began to appropriate the money to myself, forging the names both of my own father and your husband.

"The boy grew on into a sharp, active, intelligent lad, and I began to be afraid of him; the more so that there were rumors about in the neighborhood that a large fortune which he was to inherit, which I doubted not would come to his care.

"Then, I began to consider how to get rid of him; and, after many schemes had been thought of, I resolved that his death alone could save me from discovery.

Weakness began to overpower the guilty wretch, and his breath failed him.

He sank down upon his bed exhausted.

After a brief interval of repose, he started up in a hurried manner.

"I killed him!" he cried; "what's the use of concealing it now I myself am at the point of death!"

"Murder!" shrieked Mrs. Freshfield, springing to the bedside as a tiger springs on its prey.

"Woman, what have you?" said the doctor, interposing; "it is rather your duty to forgive."

"Forgive the murder of my child? Never."

"I killed him with poison—but sure. In my coat-pocket you will see the certificate;" and he fell backwards in a state of insensibility.

"Take her away," said the doctor, turning to George Freshfield. "It can do her no good to remain here now that she knows the worst."

And the sorrow-stricken woman was led away, crying:

"Gone, my child! Where is my child? Death to his murderer!"

Gideon Crawleigh hovered between life and death for two days—very little almost impossible that he could exist much longer.

There was yet another trial awaiting him, however.

He received a visit from Guy Raymond, Ralph St. Clare, and Walter Raymond.

And then, overcome—very weak and sad—sat down by the bedside of the dying man, and spoke to him not for a few moments.

The sight of the wasted form of the murderer recalled to him his own errors—the mistakes he had been guilty of—and the sin—the injustice he had wrought upon Ralph St. Clare—and the temptations into which he had thrown Walter.

"Gideon," he said, at length, "in such an hour as this it would not be right to blame you—or, at least, to invoke evil on your head. But it is my right to ask you some questions, and I expect you to answer me."

The kind tone in which this was uttered was so much in contrast with the stern look upon his face, that Gideon Crawleigh, crushed as he was, and almost frightened at its severity, was delighted into a ready answer.

"I will answer any questions," he said, feebly.

"Well me, then," asked Guy Raymond, "what is the reason you have thus attacked me?—what is the reason that, while leading one of my nephews into temptation, you have sought to ruin the other in my estimation?"

Walter stood near the bed, and at him Gideon cast a painful look.

Then, after a moment's communing with himself, he said:

"Guy, will! I may as well speak the truth now. I loved Ella, the wife of Walter—I, loved her long before she was his wife. I told her so; she spurned me, and I swore a deadly oath to be revenged upon her. I have done so, and in doing so have included the whole brood!"

The blood mounted to his face as he spoke, and his eyes flashed fiercely.

It was evident that his old spirit was again having revived within him.

Guy Raymond laid his hand upon his arm.

"Come, Gideon," he said, "let not the spirit of vengeance again arise within you. You are dying—you have time yet; this is a time for repentance, and not for revenge."

The dying man buried his head beneath the bedclothes.

"I have told you all," he said in a voice scarcely audible. "I will say no more."

And he kept his word.

Not a syllable more would he say, though again and again they urged him to it.

And so he died, none knowing whether a curse or a prayer was framed by his latest breath.

Ir is a beautiful custom in some Oriental lands to leave untouched the fruits that are shaken from the tree by the wind, these being regarded as sacred to the poor and the stranger.

THE STANDARD BEARER.

BY EDWIN L. BRUCE.

He bore our flag to the fight that day,
Where the columns moved in bright array,
And each soldier's heart beat high with pride,
As the ranks marched on like a surging tide;
Through the fiercest strife, and o'er death's despair,
He waved our banner aloft in air,
And there 'mid the dying shot and shell,
Our gallant "Standard Bearer" fell!

"Hurrah! for the Stars and Stripes," he cried,
As he plunged 'mid the battle's reeking tide.
"Furrah! for the Union—on, boys on,"
A moment more and our flag was gone;
Over the fray ever 'mid the battle's gore,
And he clutched it still with a dying clasp,
Where drums were beating—where bullets fell,
Our gallant "Standard Bearer" fell.

Then rang the voice of his aged sire,
"On—on to the charge through blood and fire,"
And soon that battle's storm he sands,
Bearing our flag in its crimson bands,
"Down—down," he cried, "with each rebel knave,
O'er Richmond's fortress our flag shall wave!
Though our "Standard Bearers" may fall and die,
Like rainbow, our banner shall sweep the sky,
And float on high."

THE TWO PROFILES.

LOUIS MUSGROVE had taken a lodging at Yorkville. It was summer. Musgrove loved the country; its roses, its fresh air, charming views, and Sunday visitors. Musgrove was a native of Virginia—young, good-looking, generous and boon-est—picturesque himself, and the lover of the picturesque in others—warm-hearted, gay in manner—an observer of life under every aspect, a writer of no mean merit, and a caricaturist of the first class. And he had taken lodgings at Yorkville, where he occasionally went to from York, so as not to lose the true smack of the city humor.

An artist, whatever his branch, weaves his art into his life, and devotes his life to his art. He "takes no thought for the morrow," is not an artist, but a mechanic. The result is not a life, at times scarcely a livelihood. So Musgrove need to go to the city, not as a traveler, but as a caricaturist. He never went by railway, but either walked, or got a lift in a wagon, or when the day was wet, took his place in an omnibus.

The day was wet, and Musgrove took his place in the omnibus. Chance took him to the end of the vehicle. A young lady sat on his right, in the corner. Musgrove began an examination of her face—he was always on the search for a new face to adorn his easel. The profile of Musgrove's neighbor was worthy the pencil of a Guido. Musgrove, of that kindred follower of the same muse, paid homage to his memory by studying the model accordingly.

But artists are not always content with still life; they require animation as well as purity of outline. It was requisite, therefore, for Musgrove, by dint of his conversational powers, to produce that play of features which perplexes and delights others besides artists. So he began about the weather.

"It rains," said he, addressing his neighbor.

"It is an interesting fact!" soliloquized spitefully and aloud, a lawyer's clerk.

"Lucky fellow," murmured an old bachelor, sighing, while one or two elderly married couples smiled to each other, approving the young gentleman's advances.

"It rains, miss," repeated Musgrove.

"It does indeed," answered the lady.

"I fear it will rain all day," continued the artist.

"There is much fear it will," responded the female flock.

"Bad for the crops," commented an agricultural couple.

"Bad for my digestion," smiled Musgrove.

"How do you account for that important statistic?" sneered the lawyer's clerk.

"Because, not being used to trot about the streets with a load of papers, I enjoy a walk from the city to Yorkville, and rely on it for my appetite."

A chuckle ran round the omnibus, in which the young lady joined with an angelic smile, the clerk having offended her by odd smiles in the way of advances.

The conversation then sank into silence, and carried not being combative to talking, each relapsed into his own thoughts, except the artist. Bent on improving the hour, and with some one, his right hand neighbor seemed to present the majority of qualifications.

"Perhaps you will be returning this evening?" hazarded Musgrove.

"No, sir, I shall not."

"Do you live here, live at Yorkville?"

"Only occasionally."

"Perhaps, then, you live in New York?" continued the artist.

"Occasionally only."

"Ah! I perceive," and Louis smiled, as one pleased with his own cleverness. "You divide your time, then, between the two fortunate spots."

"I cannot admit such a compliment."

While speaking, she gracefully arranged her veil in folds on the further side.

"Pardon, madam, the stupidity of my conversation."

"Make no excuses, sir; its stupidity was the only part that pleased me."

"Can I atone for it by offering you to-day's FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER?"

"Thank you, I have seen it."

"I beg pardon again—a thousand times,"

A face such as that could not seem mortally off-mind. On the contrary, it spoke in gentle accents.

"I am a great lover of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, and a friendly publisher supplies me with an early copy."

"Faith!" soliloquized the artist, "a widow, and one who must stand to receive early copies at Yorkville. Madam," he continued, "I am embarked to hear of your good feelings towards FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER."

"Wherefore this great joy?" asked the widow, in a tone of surprise.

"You said, I think, madam, that you patronized FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER?"

"Rather it patronizes me, by causing me to spend many a pleasant hour. I look upon it as one of my best friends."

"Then, madam, I have a little right to your good-will. I am a constant contributor to its pages, and, I trust to your pleasure."

"Are you, really? Then I am indeed glad. I have so long wished to know personally, or at least to see, some of the very clever writers for a publication that journal with such unflagging spirit."

"Madam, you will cause me to blush, or appear like an idiot."

"Impossible."

A how.

"But am I ash, without indiscretion, which are your productions?"

"Ah, madam! the proverb says, 'Every one to his taste;' it might add, 'Every one to his secret;' I know your taste. It is FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER. In return, I will tell you mine. It is to know something more of every beautiful widow I meet with in an omnibus. We are now quite on the score of tastes, but we each retain our secret. Those we can preserve, or——"

"What?"

"Exchange."

"Let us preserve them then," rejoined the widow, drily.

"To hear is to obey."

"But will you give me no indication?"

"Indication for indication."

"Well, agreed."

"Are you a draughtsman or a writer?"

"First, tell me whether you live most in Yorkville or in New York?"

"I live equally at both."

"And I can read draw with equal merit."

"Provoking! But I perceive you must be a writer, from your delicate touch."

"I have, on my part, long perceived that you were a wit, as well as a beauty."

"There, you relapse to your stupidities."

"For you reduce me to my wit's end."

"Well—to our compact—hint for hint."

"Hint for hint."

"But fair play."

"What do you mean?"

"Make me only of your wit to discover my secret—no underhand means. Do not follow me when I leave the omnibus, or ask questions about me."

"Madam, I flatter myself I am a man of honor, I give you my promise. In return, you must pledge yourself not to ask any questions about me, or to follow me when I leave the omnibus."

"Sir, I am a woman of honor. I promise."

"Then, now for our battle."

"What have you contributed to-day to the omnibus to-night?"

"You inquire into the past—I only peer into the future. Shall you return to Yorkville by omnibus to-night?"

"I not think I shall ever travel by omnibus again. It is by pure accident you met me here this morning."

"A happy accident."

"Another question. But answer my question as frankly as I answered yours: what have you contributed to this day's paper?"

"To answer you indiscreetly, without reserve, equivocation or reticence—nothing!"

"What am I to do? Here we are close to your office—you see I know where it is—and I am no further advanced than I was before."

"No more am I. But it is the easiest thing in the world to reverse. Tell me your name and address, and I will tell you mine. We have exchanged a challenge—by the rules of society, we should exchange cards."

"Although a writer for FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER, you must feel your proposition a little too enterprising. Ask yourself what you would think of a lady who consented to such an arrangement."

"Perhaps, madam, you are right. But the fear of losing so charming an acquaintance makes me hazard more, perhaps, than I have a right to stake."

"Well, we shall meet again, depend upon it."

"Is that a promise or a consolation?"

"Take it as you like."

"Will you remember that a letter addressed to Search, 924 Fourth avenue, will find me?"

"I will remember it."

"Is that an engagement or an emphasis?"

"An emphasis may be an engagement, though an engagement is not always emphatic. The omnibus is stopping for you to alight. Good morning, sir."

"May I not say au revoir, madam?"

"Say what you like."

"Will you reciprocate?"

"Yes, pas-au revoir."

"Is that an emphasis or a——"

He was on the pavement before his sentence was concluded, the door being slammed to by the driver, who, for once, was in a hurry.

For a week Louis Musgrove was desperate—for another week he was anxious—the third he was melancholy—the fourth he relapsed. At the commencement of the second month he was drifting into love with another, when a coup dashed past him in the Central Park, and the section of the Guido face greeted him with a bright smile.

Regardless of promises and philosophy, the young man rushed after the carriage. A crowd of foot passengers intercepted his career, and he returned home, more in love than ever, a sadder and a sillier man. For some days he became absorbed, abstracted and irritable. His thoughts flowed wearily, as a law for an opponent. He went to no one, and dreamed of Vanity. In due morning he rose rejoicing. The next day there appeared in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER a little story in a column of sentences. The title was taken from the old proverb, that "every cloud has its reverse." It was surrounded by a vignette of the Guido face on profile.

CHAPTER I.

It rains.

One jumps into an omnibus.

He sits next a pretty profile on his right.

The profile is a young widow.

A veil hangs in graceful folds on the further side of her face.

He falls in love with the profile.

He enters into conversation.

The red lips part and discover pearly teeth.

He becomes still more enamored of the profile.

He proposes to the profile an ice at Maillard's.

Proposition declined.

He offers a dinner at Delmonico's

Rejected.

He urges his suit.

Profile sighs.

Champagne and pâté de perigord.

Inexorable.

CHAPTER II.

His writes a burning letter.

It is answered.

He entreats an interview.

It is refused.

He writes again.

Protestations doubted.

He adores.

He receives for answer, that love, such as this, will not stand the test of misfortune.

Further protestations.

A walk to-morrow in the Central Park.

CHAPTER III

The walk begins.

Profile leans on his right arm. More lovely than ever. Veil still in graceful folds over the pale cheek.

Adorable creature!

Then you really love me?

He does indeed—and—adorable creature!

Also a little.

Why cannot see the whole of that adorable face?

What that jealous veil never be removed?

A blush.

Nay, I entreat.

Remonstrance and tremor.

A short silence. Distant thunder. Wind blows. Rain falls fast. Shelter beneath a tree. Arm disengaged to run for carriage. Carriage found. The door opens. With left arm he assists the profile to enter. Veil flies back. Profile has but one eye.

Farewell, madame.

He pays the fare of the carriage. Shuts the door, and walks home—alone—blessing the philosopher who invented flight.

CHAPTER IV

At the end of the tale was a vignette of the counter profile, with a great blot for an eye.

Some evenings, the next month, Musgrove received a letter, not at 924 Fourth avenue, but at the office of FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER:

"If Search went a little into respectable society, instead of seclining himself to write lampoons, he might perhaps meet young widows with two eyes."

Search bought some new clothes, and straightway resorted to respectable society. He received indiscriminately every invitation he received, but he did not meet his widow.

He met, by accident, a friend of his, invited him to a soirée. The painter was a rich man, and gave sumptuous parties. Large saloons, flowers, and light—everything to constitute the mind, or stimulate the senses.

Musgrove was equal to the occasion. He wished to do honor to his craft, and dressed himself magnificently.

The young man entered the hall-room to watch the dancers. His arrival soon became known, and the dancers desiring the walk-down power of the host, feared the fearful de ridicule, flagged in their steps, and their grace faded.

Musgrove to re-assure them, assumed the smile of a philanthropist, the agreeability of a philosopher, and the abstraction of a poet.

Standing half concealed near some flowers, he perused the dancing to proceed undisturbed, and yielded his mind to pleasure—his vanity some, what tickled by the sensation his presence had created, and his mind disposed to view with complacency his friend's hospitality.

Conversations buzzed around him.

GROUP 1.—ELDERLY GENTLEMEN.—NOS. 1 AND 2.

No. 1. Our friend is giving a brilliant entertainment.

No. 2. Lucky dog! With his pictures and his wife, he must have an income of at least forty thousand dollars.

No. 1. At least—and what a charming wife

No. 2. Not more charming than himself. I dine here on Wednesday.

No. 1. I agree with you. I dine on Saturday.

GROUP 2.—YOUNGER GENTLEMEN.—NOS. 3 AND 4.

No. 3. What lovely women! An artist has an eye for the beautiful.

No. 4. Beauty is enhanced by gold. So thinks our host.

No. 3. Do you see] nugrove? It is not often he goes into the world; perhaps he seeks for models.

No. 4. Better for him he does not fix upon you.

No. 3. He might d.) worse.

No. 4. Pardon me, he looks, like our host, to unite the profession of a husband to his original career.

No. 3 (from Group 1). Well there is a good choice among these women one. Mrs. Hastings Everard once more honors society with her presence.

No. 4. Society will hail with enthusiasm the representative of thirty thousand dollars a year.

No. 1. And how very beautiful she looks!

No. 3. (enraptured). Lthe a Guido.

GROUP 3.—A YOUNG LADY, NO. 5; AND A YOUNG GENTLEMAN, NO. 6.

No. 5. How very curious.

No. 6. It is indeed extraordinary.

Nos. 1 & 3.] What [extraordinary?

Nos. 2 & 4.] Is curious?

No. 5. A lady in the boudoir.

No. 6. A very beautiful person.

No. 5. Not exactly beautiful.

No. 6. Well, perhaps not, but so like.

No. 5. So like a caricature in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

No. 6. The lady with one eye?

Group 2. But has this beautiful lady only one eye?

Group 3. No; two eyes.

All. Who can she be?

The sounds murmured in the distance. Musgrove, with his heart beating, as he afterwards declared, approached the boudoir. There there, ocempying a whole sofa, dressed richly and artistically, sat the lady of the omnibus, dazzling in beauty and diamonds, smiling triumphantly, and surrounded by a platoon of admirers.

Musgrove again had occasion to admire herself by a curtain, and gazed on the beautiful vision before him. Her white neck rose majestically from her rounded symmetrical shoulders, which in their turn stood out in bold relief from the sharp outline of her velvet dress. Every turn of her head was graceful, and the well-gloved hand that held her bouquet or her fan was small and taper as a child's.

For the first time in his life Musgrove felt abashed. He could not hear her words; but as she spoke, her admirers laughed in chorus, and Musgrove thought he was telling his story, and that they laughed was against himself. He was simple-hearted, though a caricaturist, and he did not yet know that a simple fortune adds a peculiar pungency to the witticisms of a handsome man. Musgrove felt as if being ridiculed beside the young man's heart. Gulding himself with the armor of his profession, he placed a smile on his face, and jauntily he left the room. The widow observed him for the first time, and a blush spread over her face and neck. It was a good sign, if Musgrove becomes relentless.

The widow bowed.

"Good evening, sir, it is some time since we met."

He bowed in return silently.

"We have been laughing almost foolishly," she continued.

"I trust not at the humble individual who now addresses you."

"Ah! You who have others are the first to resent jokes yourselves. Supposing you were the hero of your caricature?"

"It would probably supply me with the supplement to a romance."

The widow gazed at the young man with that imploring look common to women and dogs.

"Be re-assured," she rejoined, "we have only canvassing a picture."

"I did not know you were acquainted with my friend Musgrove," interposed the host, who was passing at the moment.

"Oh, yes, indeed. We are fellow-laborers.

As the artist plying, she moved her skirts on one side with that gesture peculiar to all who invite you to sit next them on a sofa. The gesture disgusted the artist, and he remained.

"What indeed you to attack me in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER."

"To effect one of two objects; and I have succeeded."

"What were they?"

"To please myself, and then revenge myself; or to flatter you, and thus find you."

"And you think I was flattered?"

"I am sure of it."

"Do you think it legitimate to bring your sorrows to bear against a defenceless woman?"

"As legitimate as you consider it not to keep your word. I gave you my word not to follow you, you gave me yours, and I kept it."

"I made the same promise, and I kept it."

"But you gave hopes."

"Can one give hopes in an omnibus?"

"Ah, madam, an omnibus can contain as true a heart as a gilded coupé."

"Pardon! I said a sentence for your next article!"

"Sneers! You wish to humiliate me by my profession."

"You do me an injustice."

"You have treated me badly, and I cannot trust you."

"If you really knew the truth, you would not consider yourself ill-used."

"I can conceive no possible excuse."

"What would you have thought of a woman who wrote to you without knowing your name?"

"But you might have known me."

"No sooner did I discover your real name than I wrote to you."

"But you did not give me yours. You left my finding you to chance."

"You wish to humiliate me by avowals."

"What do you mean?"

"It was not quite chance that made us meet to-night."

"Why, our host did not know that we had ever seen each other."

"But his wife is a friend of mine."

"When I did see you," exclaimed the young man in a transport, "my knees almost gave way under me."

"I suppose it was only the sang froid of a writer that supported you."

"As a writer I should have succumbed; it was my artist half that sustained me."

"There are two arts even against one woman, and the game is unequal."

"Yet the woman has beaten the two men."

"Explain yourself!"

"You have learned my name, and I am ignorant of yours."

"Really, do you assert that you do not know who I am?"

"On my word of honor."

She looked at him fixedly; then continued in a low tone:

"Guess it then."

"I shall guess your Christian name."

"What is it?"

"Constance."

"Then you must know me. I have always been called Julie; but my name is Constance likewise."

"I give you my word it was a guess; but I know I could not be wrong."

"Then how did you discover me?"

"It is the name I love best."

A pause.

"Now guess my surname."

"I cannot."

"Why?"

"Surnames are vulgar, commonplaces. They were invented for the purposes of civilization or utility. We never think of those we love by their surnames—our sisters, our mothers, our children, our wives. God only lend with them on a desert island, we should soon forget any name but those of love. We are in a Christian name that lies in our hearts. Society may require me to salute you as Mrs. So-and-so. Shall I thus recall you in my inmost thoughts?"

Another pause, and the widow said, in a tremulous whisper:

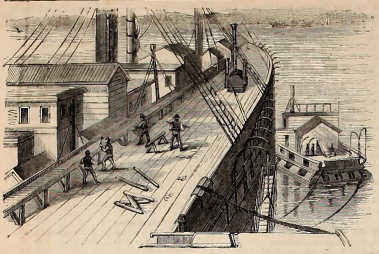
"Guess, I must tell you myself. My husband was an old man, who treated me as his daughter; his name was Hastings Everard."

"In that case, madam, I must bid you good-by."

"Why?—why?"

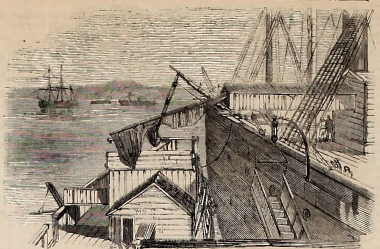
"Mrs. Hastings Everard is in every one's mouth, the beautiful widow and the rich one, with thirty thousand dollars a-year, and a husband at her feet. I thought I was speaking to my companion of the omnibus, equal to myself in fortune, and, consequently, my equal in love. Madam, I will not contend with the world, where there are so many rivals to mortify my pride during the race, and a prize to be won at last. Let us part at the starting-post, not to lose my self-esteem as well as my happiness."

The handsome features of the young man flushed as he spoke, his eyes half filled with tears.



"Let me speak, madam," he continued.

"No, sir; I will not say a word. It is not thus I part with Search. Stay."



Not many months afterwards Mr. Louis Musgrove gave a ball on his own account, and the Guido face received the guests.

HOW TO TREAT A HUSBAND.—A husband ought to be considered as a lover, with the marriage bell in his ear—married, and the wood hardly dried. If you wish the witless judiciously, be in early driven a boat, even in the most dangerous parts of his story, such as Genin's, Stewart's, De Forests, and Taylor's. The whole secret consists in your being able to manage your animal—I mean husband—so skilfully, that after driving him successfully for eight months, from store to store, he is yet able and willing to carry you to Saratoga and Newport next year. Indeed, a married wife should be able to assume, like the moon, every phase of fascination, from the full to the change, although it be a bright one—from the crescent smile encouraging the timid husband, to the cold, calm, and distant look of the wife who feels full well her power. Quarrels are of immediation, such as a diamond necklace, or new Cashmere shawl, require. Never waste your energies on your husband—let him earn them; every (since) giving is a loss. Husbands are peculiar. They are always to be despised. When a husband is generous, disperse your money freely; but be careful that you do not run the market—losses may become a drug, like corn, cocoa, cotton, coffee, sugar, and molasses, and a wife's bankruptcy commute in her nervous system. A nervous system once thus hopelessly unpeeled without the aid of open satin dresses, rosewood couches, pretty boots (no, papers only), and a handful of violets scattered, will have known a wife who screamed herself into a set of nervous fits, hysterics, and languished on, day by day, but at last, when dying, she found herself in a fifth avenue mansion, with a husband who, although without upon a galloping consumption, that she resolved to give over her ghost, and left her to her lovely years to come. Read more, dear wives, and I have done. Above all things, avoid the Bible as a book of fashion! They are always in politics, fatal to marriage. You may indulge in one before wedded—Shakespeare's—but in Christ's name, in that look, excepts of an oily boy—let those "strokes of the pen" be confined to your husband's cheque book, for the first time you write your name in it. Above all, beware of the ring—we mean that the wedding ring—it is a circle, or cut of which it is almost difficult to escape. Above all things, dear wives, it is your duty to your husband, to your children, and to your own way, even though only one—that once you are full, beware, when they say her husband's home's cool, crazy after it incessantly, and she has made dear old home broken. I can assure you, dear wives, that a liquor is not half so vicious and unreasonable as a husband who is homeless. I beg the former noble animal's pardon for the degrading comparison. Wedded liquor is to be invoked upon the senses that a woman can't do wrong. She has never been so from the days of Eve, and we're will be—all of us, it will never do for a woman to acknowledge it; the woman who makes that critical admission will be considered as the Judas Iscariot of her sex. Farewell, dear wives; now you may go and tease your husbands.

As before swift ships there swims a hill of water, and a corresponding one glides along behind, so after a battle as in a mountain which we hope to climb, there is behind us still a deep valley out of which we have ascended.

W. T. CRANE.

IN our present number we give a portrait of Mr. W. T. Crane, one of our many special war artists. He passed unscathed through the campaigns of Georgia, Florida and South Carolina, to die of a throat disease, at Washington, on the 14th of July last, where he had been stationed for some time, to furnish sketches for our paper, of the current events of the time. His last sketches, in conjunction with another of our artists, were those which illustrated the execution of the assassins of President Lincoln.

THE LATE W. T. CRANE, FORMERLY OF THE CORPS OF SPECIAL ARTISTS OF FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

Mr. Crane was born at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1832, and evinced, at an early age, a great taste for drawing. Since 1861, he has been on the staff of our special artists, and by his ability, and the truthfulness of his sketches, has illustrated many of the most glorious passages in our military history.

But it was chiefly as a good son and brother that Mr. Crane was most estimable. His brother, writing of him, says: "On behalf of the family, I thank you for your kindness to our brother, especially in caring for his remains after death. He was certainly a good brother and son—to his parents he was most devoted and affectionate—most conscientiously did he fulfill, in his capture years the filial promise of his childhood."

Those, after all, are the most precious words that can be uttered over the grave of any man, whatever his station in life.

THE GRANT-PEMBERTON MONUMENT.

THE illustration we present this week of the Grant-Pemberton monument erected at Vicksburg, July 4th, 1864, on the site where the interview took place between Gen. Grant and the rebel Gen. Pemberton, who surrendered that city to the Union forces, July 4th, 1863, is one of the many interesting features that mark the history of the late rebellion. Probably no event, during the war, gave more general satisfaction to all loyal hearts, than the surrender of Vicksburg; and from the fall of that rebel stronghold may be dated the "beginning of the end" of the "so-called" Southern Confederacy.

READING ALOUD.—It is much to be regretted that this charming accomplishment of reading aloud is not more cultivated by ladies. You see half-a-dozen girls in a family, whether they are musical or not, doomed to hours of daily practice on the piano, which is in fact often so many hours of precious time wasted, how few ever play sufficiently well to be listened to with pleasure—and many of those who do play decently give it up as soon as they are married. I am not speaking against music—let those who have a real taste devote themselves to it, but certainly it ought not to be viewed as an educational necessity, like geography or history. Now there are few people who cannot be taught to read well, and there are a thousand ways in which a good reader can give pleasure. When fathers and husbands come home, tired from their professional duties of the day, how pleasant it is to them to have some good review read aloud by wives or daughters. But to do this well, a certain amount of study is requisite—first of all it is necessary to acquire a habit of sustaining the voice, then one must learn to modulate the tones, to attend to punctuation, and, above all, the reader must have a fair appreciation of the author's meaning. This involves a study of English literature, which is sadly needed by most young ladies who are supposed to have finished their education. It is impossible to estimate sufficiently the importance of reading aloud in the family circle. Children are wonderfully impressed by fine poetry; their tastes are formed, and their minds stored with knowledge, often far beyond their years, if they have been brought up where the English classics are read aloud and talked about. And in after life, how often, amidst turmoil and trouble, some scrap of poetry or prose comes back to us in the tones in which we heard it read. Some noble sentiment—some pure thought—is thus for ever associated with "the tender grace of a day that is dead," and with "the sound of a voice that is still."

A MOTHER'S TEACHING.—The habits of thought peculiar to one sex act upon and improve the habits of thought peculiar to the other sex. Unconseciously, and from a very early period, there is established an intimate and enduring connection between the deductive mind of the mother and the deductive mind of the son. The understanding of the boy is cleared and yet sweetened by the imagination of his mother, is saved from that dog-heresy to which the sires suffer standing always inclines, and the different properties and functions of the mind are more harmoniously developed than would otherwise be practicable. Thus it is that, by the more pay or to a diffidence, the finished man is ripen'd and compl ted. Thus it is that the most successful and most sacred form of human love, the purest, the highest, and the holiest compact of which our human nature is capable, become an organ for the advancement of knowledge and the discovery of truth. In short, the other relations can rise to the highest purpose as contained. And notwithstanding a few exceptions, we do solemnly find that the most comfortment men has not only their affections but also their minds powerfully influenced by women. Beautiful is the thought which is more anxious that the beauty of knowledge should be charged, should be developed rather that the beauty of form; that it should be in order that every pleasure of the human mind may be at once and quietly brought into play.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

What creatures took the smallest amount of baggage along when they entered the ark? The cock and the fox. They had but one comb and one tail between them.

Be a German paper of this city, somebody died as to engage "a boy of fourteen years, or a young man of any age," to help him in a large beer saloon.

There is no safer protection against burglars than to feed your baby before going to bed with green apples. The latter thing will keep you awake, so that you can watch the rogues.

Mrs. Partridge is in New York. She came here from Boston as soon as she learned by telegraph that gold was rapidly falling in Wall street, but after several unsuccessful attempts to get into the street in going back a despondent woman.

A Paper, called "The Press: its ex-presses truth, ex-presses error, ex-presses knowledge, ex-presses tyranny, and ex-presses itself."

Fashion has at last taken to doing things on the square—bottoms of their shops being all the rage.

The girl who succeeds in winning the love of a true man, is a lucky girl, and is to be envied by no one.

Miss Annie Mossitry and Mrs. Ann Tipathy are exactly regarded to call upon Miss Amy A. Silby and to prove the bad impression they left behind them on Tuesday.

Any baby has just one twelve summers,—"Mamma, may I ask you a question?"

Answer.—"Marriod Why, dear?"

Answer.—"Mamma, because the children have never seen a wedding, and I thought they would be so pleased!"

For a long time it has baffled the medical authorities to account for the reason why the left boot wears almost the soles, and it has recently come to light that it arises from the fact of there being muscles in the leg.

The best way of raising money is by the sweat of the brow, and having many calves in the power.

Moral swindlers consists in asking a man to do what he ought to do without asking, and then begging his pardon if he refuses to do it. Music is a charm to soothe a savage; the Yankee is a savage; fiddler try a receipt on his head. If it does not soothe the savage, it will at least play the time both ways. Love rules the court, but he is apt to take a bull by the horns; but I think, in many instances, I should prefer the bull. A wife's duty is to love a man in sunday-school goes well and small. The tailor is the last man to be seen in the newspaper world; but, still, a great many married women are already engaged in their service as the second husband.

The Emperor of the French is about to produce "Julius Cæsar" in a new form. A new feat—to do it.

Is he published—we should say business, and will be named after the great Roman. This may be regarded as a new edition.

A very sensitive young lady on receiving a bouquet announcing that a child was ill of the small pox, sloughed the paper with a scream, under the idea that it was infected.

A Long Island boy by the seaside, asked a sailor whom she met, why a ship was called "she?" The captain of Neptune replied that it was "because the rigging cost more than the hull."

"Very difficult, is it?" said Dr. Johnson once, when a small child had finished playing a piece of music; "I wish it had been impossible!"

A Nevada paper says that a "zephyr" came into Virginia city, and in a $200 pound out of the second track, and carried it over house-tops and everything, and dumped it down half a mile off. A Nevada zephyr is a gale elsewhere.

"When Nineveh has departed and Palmyra is in ruins and Babylon and Nooze has fish'n, and the Pyramids themselves are sinking to decay, it is no wonder," sighed a French lounger, "that the Bois de Boulogne should be getting seedy at the elbows."

A young wife, in search for figures, had five eggs to boil, and being told to agrive them three minutes each, boiled them for three, an hour and a quarter.

An old Cavalonian once said: "I was born the last day in the year, the last day in the month, the last day in the week, the last day in the day, and have always been benighted. I believe it would have been fifty dollars in the pocket if I had not been born at all."

"Boys," says uncle Peter, as he examined the points of a horse, "I don't see but one reason why this mare is a great deal better made in form and figure than the rest of the horses in the stable."

They gathered round to hear this oracular opinion; and one inquired, "What is it?"

"Why," he replied, "the distance to her great fee so as short a time."

A celebrated dandy was one evening in company with a young lady, and observing how her bonnet-strings were to be advanced and begged the like favor, remarking that she ought to have as much ability for the head as the shoes to the feet.

"Sir," said the maiden, "I never blessed my dog when he was a puppy."

The fellow took the hint, and was off instantly.

A young lady was recently cured of palpitation of the heart, by a young doctor, in the most natural way imaginable. He held one of her hands in his, and his own beat near her wrist, and whispered something in her left ear.

Charles Lamb was in the habit of worring a while crawl, and in consequence was sometimes taken for a clergyman. Once at a dinner-table, among a large number of guests, he while crawl entered such a mistake to be made, and he was called on to "say grace." Looking up and down the table, he asked, in his inimitable, lisping manner:

"Is there no clerk-clergyman present?"

"No sir," answered the guest.

"Then I," said Lamb, bowing his head, "let us thank God."

True sensibility leads us to overcome our own feelings for the good of others.

How the Soldiers' Money Goes.

The honorable earnings of the soldiers are expended in a manner worthy of their public spirit and domestic virtue. They are investing millions in the government loan, and it is significant that while the sale of sewing machines for manufacturing purposes has fallen off with the contracts of army clothing, the sale of the Wheeler & Wilson machine for family use shows that the gallant soldiers have not forgotten their duty to their wives. Orders are received, written, perhaps, in the field on a drum-head, to forward machines to feminine relatives. This is a good investment. The manager of a large estate says "he has no fears for the rent if the wife has a Wheeler & Wilson sewing machine."

The Best and Safest Stimulant.—The RED JACKET BITTERS are free from all acidities usually found in ordinary tonics and stomach bitters of the present day. They are made from sound and fresh material—nothing that is not entirely wholesome and healthy enters into the composition of them.

IMPROVED

$5 SEWING MACHINE! $5

THE EMBODIMENT OF PRACTICAL UTILITY AND EXTREME SIMPLICITY.

Patented May 13, 1862; improvement patented June 9, 1863. The celebrated FAMILY GEM SEWING MACHINE, a most Wonderful and Elegantly Constructed Novelty; is NOISELESS in operation, uses the STRAIGHT NEEDLE, sews with DOUBLE OR SINGLE THREAD. Makes the Running Stitch more perfect and regular than by hand, and with extraordinary rapidity. Will Gather, Hem, Ruffle, Shirr, Tuck, Run up Breadths, &c., &c.; requires no Lubrication or Change of Stitch—IS NOT LIABLE TO GET OUT OF ORDER, and will last a LIFETIME.

"For the Dressmaker it is invaluable; for the Household it supplies a vacant place."—Godey's Ladies' Book.

"It uses a common needle, sews very rapidly, and is so easily understood that a child can use it."—N. Y. Independent.

"With single or double thread, it silently yet very rapidly, with a common needle, makes the running stitch exactly like hand sewing."—N. Y. Tribune.

All persons who buy or offer for sale imitations of this genuine Machine, will be prosecuted for infringement on the patents.
Single Machines sent to any part of the country per Express, packed in box with printed instructions on receipt of price, $5. Agents wanted everywhere. Circular containing Liberal Inducements sent free.

A Very Clever Book.

THE DOWAGER;

OR, THE

NEW SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL,

BY MRS. GORE.

"An admirable picture of modern manners in the higher classes of society, mingled with judicious remarks and pungent satire, set off by a composition, easy, animated and piquant."—London Spectator.

"This is a very clever book."—Examiner.

"Full of Genuine Comedy, which, if transferred to the stage, would be most effective. Mrs. Gore depends principally for success upon her powers of wit, and what she sees vividly she traces with vivacity. Her pages are a complete Rochefocauld of English High Life."—London Athenæum.

FRANK LESLIE'S

ILLUSTRATED

NEWSPAPER

Entered according to the Act of Congress in the year 1864, by FRANK LESLIE, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

No. 516 VOL. XX.] NEW YORK AUGUST 19, 1865. [PRICE 10 CENTS. $4 00 YEARLY. 13 WEEKS $1 00.

THE 7-30 LOAN—NIGHT AGENCIES.

THE confidence of the people in the credit of the government, was strongly manifested in their crowding to the several night agencies in New York city, opened for the accommodation of those who were unable to subscribe to the 7-30 loan during the business hours of the day. The machinery of these offices was very simple—a few desks and tables—a corps of experienced clerks and tellers—the exchange of the registered 7-30 bond for each individual loan—and the applicant at the Nation's Saving Bank becomes at once the nation's creditor and beneficiary. Thousands are accommodated in a night, and sums represented by bonds varying from the small $10 bond, which places the loan within reach of the poorest savings, to the momentous and enviable $1,000 note, are taken with republican simplicity into the vast receptacle of the United States Exchequer.

WARD'S ISLAND, EAST RIVER, N. Y.

THIS pleasant and healthy little island is situated in the East river, about five miles from New York city, and nearly opposite Hell-gate. It was selected by the municipal authorities, nearly 20 years ago, to build the State Emigrant Hospital upon, and to the excellent arrangements of the commissioners thousands owe their recovery to health. Last year, in consequence of the increasing number of patients, an additional hospital was erected, the corner stone of which was laid on the 10th of August, 1864, the Hon. Gulian C. Verplanck delivering the address.

The immense benefit of this institution to the public can be judged from the fact that last year 222,138 emigrants were landed at Castle Garden. In such an immense number the sick could not fail to be very considerable, and without referring to the mere selfishness of checking the spread of infection, lest it should reach our own households, the philanthropic heart can enter into the immense amount of suffering soothed by its means.

The buildings at Ward's Island for the reception of aged or chronically diseased poor, for lunatic women, for the nurseries, for wash and bake houses, for residences for the superintendent and physicians, are all admirably adapted for their special purposes, and are quite separate.

In 1860 Mr. James P. Fagan was appointed superintendent of Ward's Island, and has continued to discharge the duties with great satisfaction.

The whole number of inmates, whether diseased in the hospital, or the infirm and helpless in the other departments, during 1864, was 7,253, being 2,452 more than in 1863, and 4,116 more than in 1862.

The average annual cost of support was $125 a head. Of the above average of 924 persons sustained and aided in the Ward's Island Institution, 597 were hospital patients, and 327 inmates of the refuge department. Abundant supplies of vegetables, as well as poultry, eggs, &c., are raised on the extensive grounds attached to the buildings, and contribute greatly to the health and comfort of the patients.

The hospitals are divided into a medical and a surgical department. The medical department proper, including the asylum for the insane, is under the charge of a salaried physician, wholly resident on the island, with as many salaried assistants as the hospital service may require from time to time. George Ford, M. D., who had several years practical experience on a large scale, in various medical positions in the hospitals of this commission, during periods when the wards were filled with the greatest number of patients and variation of disease, was in 1858 appointed Physician-in-chief at

CLOSING OF THE 7-30 LOAN—SCENE AT ONE OF THE NIGHT OFFICES IN BLEEKER STREET, NEW YORK CITY—THE MECHANICS AND OTHER LABORING MEN SUBSCRIBING FOR THE LOAN.

Ward's Island, and has since discharged the duties of that station with fidelity and success. He resides on the Island, and devotes himself exclusively to the service of the institution, as also does his assistant, Dr. Hermann Gollaka. Dr. Boyer, the present assistant in the surgical department, also rendered valuable assistance, on the occasion referred to.

The surgical department remains under the care of J. Murray Carnochan, M. D., who has had the sole charge of it as surgeon-in-chief since 1845. He regularly visits the surgical wards at fixed times, and also calls in addition in the surgical emergency cases, and performs all important operations. He has also one assistant surgeon, resident on the Island. This place is now filled by John Boyce, M. D., who was appointed on the resignation of Dr. Harbourne. One or more additional assistants may have been and will be appointed whenever the number of surgical cases demands more aid, which has not been the case for the last or preceding year.

The sick-rate give of the cotton mill is very interesting, as it is the first one ever erected in this state.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS OF FRANK LESLIE'S

Chimney Corner.

NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received by it in the first single publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publication in the United States, having been produced as an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will remain to future generations the men that have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains as an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is illustrated, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

The hat was passed round in a certain New York congregation, for the purpose of taking up a collection. After it had made the circuit of the church it was handed to the minister, who, by-the-bye, had "exchanged pulpits" with the regular preacher, and is found not a penny in it. He inverted his hat over the parish register and shook it, that its emptiness might be known; then looking towards the ceiling, he exclaimed, with great fervor, "I thank God this I've got my hat from this congregation!"

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

CAUTION!

We would respectfully caution the public and our subscribers in the Western States against a woman setting herself as Mrs. L. Brown, who is in the habit of collecting subscriptions and receiving money for Patterns, etc. She is an impostor. We have no traveling agents.

Our New Story.

With the present number we commence "BOUND TO THE WHEEL," a story of extraordinary interest, from the pen of the well-known and popular author of "Guy Waterman's Mare," "Reuben's War," and other tales familiar to the readers of select literature.

"BOUND TO THE WHEEL" was originally written for, at a larger price than was ever paid before for any similar story; a pecuniary outlay on our part, made solely with a view to present our legion of subscribers with the choicest efforts of genius.

Our Financial Statement.

The official statement of the public debt, as appears from the books of the Treasury Department, on the first of July, shows the amount outstanding to be $2,757,253,275 85, divided thus, viz.: Debt bearing interest in coin, $1,193,602,641 80, on which the interest is $54,321,197 60; debt bearing interest in lawful money, $1,289,156,545, on which the interest is $77,749,639 78; debt on which interest has ceased, $1,927,120 — debt bearing no interest, $337,026,968; total interest, both in coin and lawful money, $132,070,837 38. The following table of the circulation were as follows: One and two years' 5 per cent. notes, $39,934,450; United States notes, old issue, $174,639; United States notes, new issue, $432,987,966; compound interest notes, act of March 3, 1863, $15,000,000; compound interest notes, act of June 30, 1864, $146,681,477; total legal tenders in circulation, $635,230,259.

The amount of fractional currency is $25,750,000; the amount of gold certificates, $16,095,000; the miscellaneous items of the War and Navy Departments, $15,736,000; amount of cash in the Treasury, gold and silver and currency, $81,402,000; total amount in the Treasury, $116,793,652 35. The statement of the public debt on the first of August, the statement which that made on the 31st of May, shows an increase of $122,000,000, owing in part to the extraordinary expenses during the month of June, and in part to the amount of legal tender notes in circulation shown an increase of $26,073,760.

There is no truth in the reports circulating in some parts of the country that the $5 note had been called in, and that the new issue of six of the national banks first organized. A slight change was made in the lettering and in the vignette of the $5 plate, which accounts for the variation now seen between the three first issued and subsequent ones. There are no counterfeits of any denomination of the National currency.

The total number of National banks chartered since the law was passed, to the 1st instant, is 1,839, with an aggregate capital of $370,000,000, and a circulation of $161,971,180.

THE recent election in England for members of the House of Commons, deserves to be principally noted for the defeat, from the fact that "Tom Brown" has been returned from Lambeth, John Stuart Mill from Westminster, and Mr. Forster from South Lancashire. All these men are staunch friends to the United States, and distinguished in the world of letters, Lambeth has elected a statesman, Mr. Gladstone, to whom the eyes of the times point unerringly as the successor of Lord Palmerston. Westminster has elected a man who is called seat of English learning, and the very home of a pig-headed conservatism which hesitates at all progress, and John Stuart Mill, while it contributes nothing in the world of politics or the sphere of ideas to the advancement of England, is especially or morally, and hit little intellectually. Mr. Gladstone, moving, albeit slowly, with the spirit of the age, is not a fitting representative of University and fangus-grown Oxford, to the influence of which we may trace whatever was debilitating in his moral composition, and hesitating or dubious in his conduct. As the representative of an active, living constituency like that of South Lancashire, and the champion of the nation and the sufferings of the world have designated him—that of Prime Minister of Great Britain.

J. BILLINGS, Esq., is at Long Branch, and thinks that a change of air is necessary, as he finds it's the same number or visitors are opatite ov." Remains predominate there, as everywhere else, this season. Our philosopher observes: "If it perfekly hurts renting two se the females hire in search of natural protektors. I konsted 16 yer gentlay in one pile, they all sighed as 1 pair to them, and with down-cast eyes. I felt sorry for them, but couldn't help them, for I am married to marrid, and intend to remane so." Dinnar at Long Branch "is served at 2 o'clock; opens with soup, and skuttle up with blackberries." The amusements are crokking and bathing. Of the first, Mr. Billings observes: "Yesterday I went out bruhking, and hotched a pock on them, they bite sideways, and hang on like a dead hoss shoe; they make good vittles enuff, but they aint prostible few eat, if you kount your time with enny thing." As to bathing: "It is luxurious, and the bathers resemble mermaids, half men and half wimmin; they sed dress in the Choctaw hostom, and when they emerges from the water, yu kant tell which is who, unless yu ask them."

RICHARD HILDRETH, of Boston, whose "History of the United States," written in a positive sense as contrasted with the romantic style adopted by Macaulay and Hallam, and other young poets, died in Trieste, Austria, on the 11th of July. His career as a writer was one of rare industry, energy and industry. He was born at Deerfield, Mass., June 28th, 1807. He graduated at Harvard College in 1826. He was one of the founders of the Boston Atlas, and associated editor of that journal from July, 1832, to Oct. 1834, and subsequently was a leading contributor and a "Washington correspondent." In addition to his productions as a journalist, he was the author of several occasional works, a political novel, entitled "The White Slave;" Life of President Harrison; and other works bearing the marks of his facile pen. He also was an efficient lawyer, and the originality and independence of his opinions. The last chapters of his performances was his "History of the United States."

HENRY S. FOOTE, who once beat Jeff. Davis in a contest for the governorship of Mississippi, who was subsequently United States Senator from that State, and who, in December of 1858-61, was still later senator in the rebel Congress which he left in disgust, in search of some "secretered spot," has lately written a most amusing book about current affairs to a Mr. Nicholson, of Tennessee, which relates much curiously on the fore-ordained precinct wisdom of its author. Of the causes of the war he says:

"We sanctified all the sentiments that supplied to us by Gerald Griffin, Moore, or timely contributed we daily kept up the habit of sentimentalizing, and, from a very early age to time, such inflammable rubbish was supplied to us by Mrs. Hemans, Longfellow, and the impressive Democratic press, that pictures, and poetry, and prose, and music, all conspired to feed the taste of which has been made inevitable."

Slavery he pronounces dead, and urges that the constitution be amended by a clause that the better for it and the country; but, he continues:

"In order to be free ourselves we must never interfere with the freedom of others. We must abandon the state constitutions as soon as possible, and embody therein the essence of the 4,000,000 of letters that abound between be-tokens existing upon southern soil, and in the records and in the memories of every one of the white ones who have dominated over them; to retain the right of emigration with the wives and children already existing, and bind ourselves to do nothing to contribute to their flight. We want, in order to secure our own return to liberty and happiness, not only exemption from all interference, but the right to compel us must allow them the same means of protection which they require for us—a view of the question. They must be recognized in fact as well as in name.

"We must consent to their being invested with the elective franchise, and to their not be done, no matter what clashfall methods we may contrive it to be done, and we must consent to their being allowed to have her voice received as the deciding one in all matter per our regulation, but are to be attended by the sanctions of the proper heads examined by sword and the purse of the nation.

"I tell you, sir, that the only through you I wish to urge upon the whole mass of my fellow-countrymen is that, unless this be done, unless it be done by us, the one states will not be allowed to have senators and representatives in the seat of the government, without molestation, to administer their own municipal regulations, and to act constitutionally in self-matter; it is my judgment, and there is no appeal to me in the case."

PROFESSOR GOEPPERT'S long-expected prize essay "On the Vegetable Nature of Diamonds," has recently been published; illustrated by colored plates. Experiments show that diamonds cannot be produced by Plutonic agency, as they become black when subjected to a high degree of temperature. Prof. Goeppert, of the University of Neptunia on organic, and were at one time in a soft condition, it proved not only by the impressions of grains of wheat and barley, but by the surface of some of them, not also by the incidences of certain foreign bodies, such as other crystals, which have penetrated, and by the vegetable structure of a higher organization. If Professor Goeppert's conclusions be accepted, diamonds are only and nothing, as they do, the views held by Newton, Brewster and Liebig, diamonds seem to be the first product of the chemical decomposition of vegetable substances.

It seems to be one fate, that as fast as we constitute a civil service for the rest of the south, we have to use the "war power" to prevent its working. Voting, on present system of suffrage, readily becomes a means for traitors to office who "qualify" by perjury. Gen. Terry has just put down, by force of arms, a municipal government elected by falsehood by force of false swearing.

CAPT. TILLEY, of the British Royal Engineers, proposes a plan for running railways over high mountains, instead of through them. In order to obtain great traction power for locomotives, a third rail is laid between the two outer rails, and at an elevation of about seven inches above the level of the others. This rail is grasped by horizontal wheels, worked at right angles to the usual vertical driving wheels. By this method, it is said, trains drawn by engines weighing 16 tons 17 cwt., are enabled to ascend gradients of 1 in 12; and as the plan can be carried parallel to the existing road, the estimated cost is $35,000 a mile, instead of $242,300, that of the line now in process of construction through Mont Cenis.

THE product of petroleum in Pennsylvania alone is put down, for the year 1865, at 3,500,000 barrels of crude oil, worth, taking the average of prices, $21,000,000. This estimate is based on the value of the crude oil at the mouth of the wells. It may thus be said that our product of petroleum is worth a quarter as much as our product of wheat, and one-eighth as much as our product of corn or of cotton—taking an average of five years prior to the war as the basis of an estimate of our sectional crop. Borers for oil have this estimate him—they enter for a market which cannot be glutted. The world will consume, at a price, all the petroleum which can be produced. Europe increased her consumption from 10,000,000 gallons in 1862 to over 30,000,000 gallons in 1864, and will take 100,000,000 gallons in 1866, if they can be furnished at a price to suit.

AN English gentleman, Mr. A. M. Bell, has devised a new method of writing sounds: it consists in picturing, by totally new symbols, the actions of the several organs of speech, tongue, lips, teeth, etc. The number of fundamental symbols is 32. Each one of these is a direction to do something; so that if the ear of the reader perform the sound it represents, he would be taught it again by merely following the directions. The symbols, for example, represent the most primary actions of the organs; put together, they produce compounds. All sounds, for example, in the complex operation; it comes among what are called inarticulate sounds; but Mr. Bell writes it down, and for ought we know could undertake to furnish every man with a symbol representative of his own particular sneeze, as distinguished from that of his next neighbor. His method is teached in the following way. Mr. Bell sends his two sons out of the room, and then invites the company to make sounds in any language, pronounced rightly or wrongly, and sounds of any kind, no matter how unusual or strange; for it is the essence of this method that whatever the organs of speech can do, the new alphabet can record. Mr. Bell tries each sound himself, until the proposer admits that he has got it; then he writes it down. After a score of such attempts have been recorded, the young gentlemen are recalled, and they forthwith read what is presented to them, reproducing to a nicety, amid general laughter and astonishment, all the queer jargons which a perfect variety of philologists have strained their muscles to invent. The original symbols, which read sounds, are printed, and make a christian fancy himself in a menagerie.

HON. HORACE MAYNARD, recently elected Member of Congress from the Knoxville District (Tenn.), made a speech recently in which he gave now his constituencies, from which we take the following passage:

"A great question is made against negro suffrage. I do not think that a majority of the American people would be willing to establish that universally; but they are deeply to prevent it, hesitating to interpose a veto in the case of the rebel States before the establishment. It is the notion that all is negro-ruinous and that we are in ruin. It is not the fact to give sufferage to the negro population, who have, all through this war, been true to the Union and to the flag. This measure, in that event, will be adopted as an indemnity and a protection to the loyal people of the south, when the seditious white people now rescue to submit to the law and discharge their duties as peaceful citizens."

GEN. HOGERS is now in command of the department which includes New York, where his headquarters are to be established. At a dinner given to the officers of certain Massachusetts regiments, he made a brief speech, in which occurs the following paragraph. In the only one we believe, embodying, in any degree, his views on the questions of the day:

"The era of reconstruction is clear. The southerners may not love the government as formerly, but we have whipped them, and they know it. Now, then, until they cease to behave themselves properly. It is under a proper obligation to protect them. The government, we will help them; until they don't, we won't. Now that we have accomplished so much, our bayonets are as sharp and our weapons as bright for any future service for the Union as they have been in the past."

A MANUSCRIPT of Milton's "Paradise Lost" is played in Paris, which mortally offends an English critic, who thus writes: "The idea of so humiliating one of the noblest works of man to have it ornamented by the same painter, with the tree of knowledge in the second grooves, and Adam and Eve in the costume of Cochin-China, will be a disgrace not even of the choicest description, as astonishing enough; but when, in the fourth act, the sons of Cain are introduced dancing a ballet, with modern sensuous accessories, it becomes, to an English mind, simply shocking, or even disgusting."

THERE are rumors afloat of a new European Conference—a Congress of the so-called Great Powers of Europe. The London Spectator does not admit the existence, and very remarks that "the consciousness that a seventh great power, impregnable at home and very formidable abroad, has stood aside from indifferent interests, must tend to increase the consciousness that its decisions will but slightly affect the factor. To peace which does not find the American Union can have much effect upon the British marine."

THE visit of the Emperor of the French to Algeria has led him to determine on great and sweeping changes in the internal administration of that French dependency. Algeria, hitherto, has been governed by the Arabs. The Arabs are to be secured in their lands; the constitution of their tribes is to be recognized, and the tenure of property is to be altered. This unless an express wish is announced that it should be held by individuals. They are to have their peculiar grounds respected, and their forest land, where waste or in course of extinction, is to be replanted. Their religion is to be treated with the greatest respect, and their festivals are henceforth to be kept with official solemnity by their Christian conquerors. They alone are to decide every question of their law which turns upon religion—a wide concession to men whose one religious is also their one legal authority. In secular matters, they are to be supplied with abundance of the best French law, and cease at land; whereas the inhabitants of the desert, as the Emperor discovered to his amazement, have now to walk a distance of 400 leagues to exact justice or receive punishment. At Algiers an Arab school of legal study is to be established, here aspirants may qualify themselves to decide the difficult question, whether a question is a religious one or not, and may learn the rules of the Koran by which they ought to settle it if it comes within their province. The Arabs are also to have schools, pawn-shops, hospitals and almshouses provided for them; and an impost, fixed for ten years, is to be demanded from them, to be paid according to the number of tents if they are dwellers in the wilderness, and to be paid by individuals in the settled districts. In fact, if they like to be civilized, they are to be privileged Frenchmen; and if they like not to be civilized, they are to be privileged Arabs.

THE thickest iron-plating of our new iron-clad, Dunderberg, is but four and a half inches, while our monitors of the Dictator and Kalamazoo class have fifteen inches on the turret and ten and a half inches on the sides. Of the English iron-clads, the Bellerophon has six inches solid plate, besides one and a half inches plating and strong iron ribs, while the Hercules has nine inches solid plating. The plan of the Dunderberg was the result of our experience of 11-inch guns with fifteen pounds of powder, such as were used in the first iron-clad fight at Fortress Monroe. Since she was designed we have advanced to 15-inch guns, with sixty pounds of powder, and are still actively progressing in the same direction. If it is within the skill of the builder, might it not be advisable to increase the armor of the Dunderberg, even at the expense of her armament? Guns are fighting hard for the mastery, and the chances are still in their favor for any class of vessels except the monitors.

MERLE D'AUBIGNE, of Geneva, Switzerland, the well-known author of the "History of the Reformation," wrote a letter on the death of President Lincoln, to our minister at Berne, from which we make the following extract:

"The blow which has struck Mr. Lincoln strikes all the friends of justice, order, liberty and religion. He has been the instrument of God for the accomplishment of one of the greatest acts, perhaps the very greatest which will illustrate our century—the definite abolition of slavery throughout Christendom. He is not only the instrument but the victim. While not venturing to compare him with the great sacrifice of Golgotha, which gave liberty to the captives, is it not just in this hour, to recall the word of an Apostle (1 John iii. 1); "In this we have known love, in that Christ has laid down his life for us; and, therefore, ought we also to lay down our lives for our brethren." Who can say that the President did not lay down his life by the firmness of his devotion to a great duty? The name of Lincoln will remain one of the greatest that history has to inscribe on its annals."

TOWN GOSSIP.

ALL the fashionable people being out of town—the creme de la creme at Saratoga, and the rest at other places—the Town Gossip is necessarily limited. It is *paw*sotively painful, as Lord Dundreary would say, to ride up Broadway—we say, ride, for locomotion is out of the question at 90 in the shade. Not even the last rose of summer is left. Care-worn merchants, toil-worn clerks, bibulous editors—or, we should say, subs and contributors, for your true editor never drinks till he dines at six, and then he may take a glass of claret or Chambertin, to encourage or reward that gentle flow of ideas which ever attends the serene intellectual man. Broadway, we say, is entirely given over to toil and care-worn human dust, which, garbed in linen dusters, mops off Niagaric cataracts of adipose moisture, larding the lean earth. Marryatt's or Munchausen's fearful picture of Broadway being strewed with unoccupied suits of clothes, with only a greasespot on the pavement, to show for what once had been a fellow-mortal of flesh and blood, may yet be realised, if the municipal authorities do not do something to mollify the thermometer; but in such weather it is perhaps too much to demand of our city fathers a greater exertion than to award a fat contract to some of the ring. With this highly charitable expression we will languidly ask the public to excuse the brevity of our present Town Gossip, and turn to Leigh Hunt's description of similar weather on the other side of the Atlantic. In the mean time we must content ourself by recommending the present intelligent reader to think of everything that is cool—let him, in imagination, stand under some beautiful crystal cascade, and, in fancy, feel the refreshing waters bathe him in their invigorating streams—let him think of the ruminating cow, standing in a pleasant little patch of water under shady trees—let him think of a duck under a water-spout, in a rain-storm, or of a man surrounded by ice carts—let him do anything except talk to an Irishman about the Fenian Brotherhood, or contradict an silent woman, for of all overbearing and resistless living vocabularies a quiet woman is the most terrible; when her "hoarded silence" is once set going—it is more like an Alpine avalanche, than anything else. We trust our readers will like "hoarded silence," thus converted into "ready talk," by a figure of speech—and with this original phrase we conclude, by observing, that if there has been any Gossip about Town this week, we have not discovered it. Au revoir.

Mr. Barnum is not the man to let either his fame or his energy lie idle, and the destruction of the American Museum, which would have ruined some people, has only made him a little extra trouble. He means to go to Europe soon, and, with an energetic assistant, bring away whatever he finds on that continent that is curious, and put it in the New American Museum, for the use of his diocese of North America. Mr. Barnum wanted to send Bayard Taylor on this errand, but the poet, lecturer and traveler was obliged to postpone the engagement. He will go next summer, however, and answered Mr. Barnum's offer in the following pleasant note:

CEDARCROFT, July 25, 1865.

MY DEAR MR. BARNUM:

The sympathy which I, in common with all of your friends, feel with you in your loss, seems almost to be superfluous in view of the buoyant energy you exhibit. I regret that I am not able to assist you in the way you desire, as my literary engagements will not permit me to visit Europe this year. If I go next summer—as is probable—I may be able to further some of your many plans. Meanwhile I shall look over my own souvenirs of travel, and try to find some articles of public interest for your new collection. My relics are mostly of mere personal value, but I have some which the public might find interesting. I am sure you will get abundant help from all quarters; and so, wishing you every possible success, I am, always sincerely yours,

BAYARD TAYLOR.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A Southern paper gives its readers the following advice: "Accept the 'situation' as you find it. Don't pause to fret. Move on. Keep up with the times. We hope for much from Southern climate, Southern nature, Southern brains. Progress is the watchword now. Power lies in the metal of the ploughshare, and true Southern independence relies upon Southern exertions upon the field—not of battle—but of waving grain and cotton balls.

—— The population of the State of New York amounts, by the appearance of the present returns, to 4,350,000. This is about the population of England in the time of Elizabeth; is nearly the present population of Bavaria, and 700,000 more than that of the Kingdom of Holland.

—— Miss Imogen Willis, daughter of N. P. Willis, editor of the Home Journal, was married on the 1st inst., at Idlewild, to Dr. Williams Eddy, of New Bedford, Mass.

—— Eugenie, Empress, is driving a light pony-carriage this summer, with ponies dyed to match her toilette, and every day a change.

—— An itinerant preacher, who rambled in his sermons, when requested to stick to his text, replied, that "scattering shot would hit the most birds."

—— The city and immediate suburbs of Boston, will show by the census now taking, a population of nearly 400,000 people, thus making that metropolitan one of the greatest centres of population on this continent. The valuation of Boston and suburbs will nearly reach $500,000,000, (the city alone having $370,000,000). This vast sum will place Boston as the richest city, per capita, probably in the world. New York has some $700,000,000 valuation; Philadelphia, $150,000,000; Baltimore, $100,000,000. The entire state of Maine has but $100,000,000 valuation, or only one-fourth part of this city. The eleventh ward of Boston has nearly the same population and valuation as Portland, Me., and is almost a city itself, being in many respects a distinct quarter. Since 1850 this ward has almost sprung into existence.

—— Workmen are now engaged in removing the wood-work, furniture, &c., from Ford's Theatre, preparatory to remodeling it as a fire-proof building for the reception of the archives of the late rebel government.

—— The return of the census of the city of Albany, gives a population of 61,875, against 62,367 in 1860. In some wards there is a decrease, and in others an increase. The county of Albany at the next apportionment, must, therefore, lose one member of Assembly.

—— The criminal statistics of our city for the past three months are not very pleasant reading. From the 1st of May to the 31st of July 20,467 arrests were made by our local police. Of these 14,372 were males, and 6,095 females. For the quarter ending April 30 there were only 7,875 arrests in all. During the war the arrests averaged from 3,600 to 4,000 per quarter. The increase of crime that these figures shew is really alarming, and should attract more public attention than it has heretofore done. The items of increase are in assaults and robberies; that is, crimes against person and property.

—— Admiral Dahlgren was married on the 2d of August to Mrs. Goddard, of Washington, D. C., daughter of Hon. S. Vinton, of Ohio. The bridegroom is 55; the bride 28.

—— The City Fathers of Hoboken have at last resolved to put the laws against liquor dealers in force in that picturesque place.

—— The President is still too unwell to undergo the fatigue of receiving dispatches.

—— Late advices from Georgia state that the cotton crop this year will be exceedingly light—not more than one-sixteenth of the average yield. Until the labor system becomes more settled, it is feared that next year's crop will be even smaller. The rice yield on the Altamaha will scarcely exceed one-thirtieth of the usual yearly crop.

—— The commission to visit the Indians who affiliated with the rebels, and to make permanent peace with them, has been organized at Washington. Gen. Herron, one of the commission, is in that city.

—— On the evening of the 2d inst. the steamer Cossack arrived at Newport News, to take in coal. The 1st Maine regiment was on board, and were landed. The men immediately set to work to clear out the store of the post sutler, Nicholas White, who lost nearly all of his stock, valued at $7,000. The men were re-embarked, but were kept at anchor off Fortress Monroe, under the probability of being ordered back to settle damages.

—— Delegates from every elective precinct in each county of the Territory of Colorado will assemble on the 8th of this month at Denver, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of forming a state government and making application for admission into the Union at the earliest possible moment. If it is deemed expedient, a state constitution for Colorado will be framed, provisions made for its submission to the people, and if adopted, for the election of state officers and representatives to Congress. Elections were to have been held on the 27th ult., in the several county precincts for delegates to the territorial convention. The call is issued under the auspices of the executive committees of the several political parties.

—— The stock of specie in bank and the sub-treasury office of New York is not much short of $50,000,000.

—— The reports of the failing health of Jeff. Davis, caused an inquiry from the War Department as to the real state of the prisoner's health. The report made sets forth that the prisoner, Jefferson Davis, is in the enjoyment of excellent health; and, moreover, that his physical condition has visibly improved since his incarceration at Fortress Monroe.

—— A census of the state of New York is now in progress, and the returns of New York city show that its population is 1,003,250; an increase of $189,581 since 1860. The total valuation of property in the city is 608,784,355. Real estate increased $16,055,309, while personal estate nominally fell off $46,000,000, owing largely to the fact that the government bonds are non-taxable. It is estimated that the aggregate population of the state is 4,350,000.

—— Mr. Samuel N. Pike, of Pike's Opera House, Cincinnati, has purchased the property at the corner of 8th avenue and 23d street, New York, and designs erecting an opera-house of spacious and elegant proportions.

—— There is a project on foot at Niagara Falls to make a new communication between the American and Canadian side of the Niagara river in the shape of a suspension bridge for carriages and foot passengers.

—— It is estimated at the Freedmen's Bureau that at least 40,000 freedmen have learned to read and write since the rebellion broke out.

—— A Connecticut editor, traveling in Nevada, says that all sorts of languages are used there—English, French, German, Spanish, Irish, Chinese, Pi Ute, &c., but he thinks none is spoken with so much fluency and freedom, and none seems to be so generally understood, as profane language.

—— Salt is obtained in Arizona in beautiful transparent crystals, and in large quantities. The salt mountains are located some 60 miles above El Dorado Canon, up the Colorado, and are said to be a great curiosity and wonder to all travelers who have visited them. The packers chop the salt out of the mass with axes.

—— The Pittsfield Eagle says the work on the east end of the Hoosac Tunnel is progressing at the rate of 16 feet a day into the solid rock of the mountain.

—— A provision of the Constitution lately adopted in Missouri makes it obligatory upon every preacher and teacher of religion, and every teacher of any school, public or private, to take, subscribe and file his oath of loyalty within 60 days after the 4th of July, on penalty of a fine of $500, or imprisonment in the county jail for six months if they continue to preach or teach without taking and filing the oath.

—— Samuel Caswell, of Barnstead, N. H., is 109 years of age, and has never drank intoxicating liquors nor used tobacco in his life. He has never worn spectacles and his eyesight has been perfectly good till within a year. He has mowed grass every summer since he was 12 years old till the present, and has never had a physician but three times, and those lately. His wife is living, in good health at the age of 96.

Foreign.—When Ab-del-Kadir reached Paris, he was accompanied by three wives, five Arabs in Oriental costume, and a pet bear; the whole forming an exhibition which created quite a ferment among the excitable Frenchmen.

—— The London Athenæum defines the meaning of the title F. R. S. as a man who Fairly Represents Science.

—— A curious calculation has been made lately by a savant well known in Paris by his peculiar antipathy to the fly. He collected 3,000 flies in a room measuring two cubic metres; on the floor he spread a pounded loaf of sugar. At the end of four days he went to investigate the result of his experiment. There remained a table-spoonful of sugar. This statistician therefore calculates that sugar being at the rate of 13 cents a pound, a fly costs the country 20 cents from its birth to its demise.

—— Vesuvius again menaces an eruption. Flames are seen to issue from the principal summit every night.

—— The total number of peers who have died during the late session of the British Parliament, amounts to 112, and their united ages reach 7,583 years, giving an average of 67 years to each. The highest average age was with the archbishops, 80; next come the viscounts, 74; the bishops show the third highest average, 73; the earls come next with 68; the marquises average 66; and the dukes and barons are the lowest, each with 65. The deceased Scotch peers average 85; the Irish, 63.

—— It is said, that owing to the falling off in the supply of rat-skins in Paris this season, there will be a rise in the price of "extra fine kid gloves."

—— It reads almost like a joke, but the French Funds were agitated because the Prince Imperial had a sore throat!

—— Le Journal des Debats of Paris had an elaborate editorial advising Spain and Brazil to take warning from the United States and abolish slavery before it leads to a similar catastrophe.

—— Sax, of Sax-horn celebrity, has just brought out an extraordinary invention by which the sound (of all brass instruments, of all wind instruments, I believe), can be increased to a marvelous extent, so that a band of six musicians can make as much noise as one of 60. In some of these instruments the volume of sound is increased 35; in others but six or seven. The public has not yet been admitted to judge of the merits of Mr. Sax's ingenious invention, only a few private concerts having been given before the Empress left Paris. She admitted the musician to an interview, listened to the effects of the magnified sound, and was so much pleased that she gave a gold medal to M. Sax.

—— Mr. Adam Black is at present very unpopular with his constituency in Edinburgh, which has given rise to a respectable joke. "What can have caused Adam's fall?" asked one constituent. "The Eve of an election," was the reply.

—— It is calculated that within 30 years there have been in Spain about 50 different premiers and 400 ministers, so frequent have been the change in the Cabinet.

The oldest paper in the civilized world is the Gazette de Paris, which in 1865 enters its 235th year.

CORAL ROCKS.

THE coral rocks, which grow from the bed of the ocean, were formerly thought to be of a vegetable nature; but subsequent investigation has demonstrated that the foundation of these immense masses is effected by certain species of polypes. A portion even of England is based on a foundation of coral, many of our transition rocks containing an immense number of fossil corals; and many islands between the tropics appear to rest entirely on masses of coral rocks. The order and regularity with which these vast accumulations of solid matter are constructed, by means apparently so inadequate to the end, are no less astonishing than the amazing number of such masses which are known to exist.

Thousands of islands in the Eastern Ocean owe their origin entirely to this source; and particularly those in the Indian Archepelago, and round New Holland, are produced by various tribes of these animals; especially by the cellepora, isis, madrepora, millepora, and tubipora. The animals which form these corals work with such rapidity, that enormous masses of them very soon appear where there were scarcely any marks of such reefs before; and the navigation of the seas in which they abound is rendered every day more difficult by the continually increasing number of coral reefs, which will become the basis of future islands. These reefs have flat tops, and rise so perpendicularly from the bed of the sea, that the officers of vessels, within only two ship's length of them, have found no bottom at the depth of 150 fathoms, or nine hundred feet! It is an interesting object of geological research to trace the progress of these foundations, by the minute but combined labors of millions of these marine zoophytes, which occupy the lowest rank in the animal kingdom; but which have been instrumental in giving to the earth its present form. The following interesting extract from "Kotzebue's Voyages" gives the best description of the mode in which the islands, consisting of coral reefs, may have been progressively formed:

"As soon as the ridge or reef has reached such a height that it remains almost dry at low-water, at the time of ebb, the polypes cease from building higher. Sea-shells, fragments of corals, sea hedge-hog shells, and their broken-off prickles, are united by the burning sun, through the medium of the cementing calcareous sand, which has arisen from the pulverization of the above-mentioned shells, into one whole or solid stone; which, strengthened by the continual throwing up of new materials gradually increases in thickness, till it becomes at last so high, that it is covered only during some seasons of the year by high tides. The heat of the sun so penetrates the mass of stone, when it is dry, that it splits in many places, and breaks off in flakes. These flakes, so separated, are raised one upon another by the waves, at the time of high water. The always active surf throws blocks of coral (frequently of a fathom in length, and three or four feet thick) and shells of marine animals, between and upon the foundation stones; after this the calcareous sand lies undisturbed, and offers to the seeds and trees of plants, cast upon it by the waves, a soil, upon which they rapidly grow, to overshadow its dazzling white surface. Entire trunks of trees, which are carried by the rivers from other countries and islands, find here, at length, a resting-place, after their long wanderings. With these come some small animals, such as lizards and insects, as the first inhabitants. Even before the trees form a wood, the real sea-birds nestle here, strayed land-birds take refuge in the bushes, and at a much later period, when the work has been long since completed, man also appears, builds his hut on the fruitful soil, formed by the corruption of the leaves of the trees, and calls himself the lord and proprietor of this new creation."

THE BAY OF RIO DE JANEIRO.

THE Bay of Naples, the Golden Horn of Constantinople and the Bay of Rio de Janeiro are always mentioned by the traveler tourists as pre-eminently worthy to be classed together for their extent, and for the beauty and sublimity of their scenery. The first two, however, yield the palm to the last-named magnificent sheet of water, which in a climate of perpetual summer, is enclosed within the ranges of singularly picturesque mountains, and dotted with the verdure-covered islands of the tropics. He who, in Switzerland, has gazed from the quai of Vevay, or from the windows of the old Castle of Chillon, upon the grand panorama at the upper end of the Lake of Geneva, can have an idea of the general view of the Bay of Rio de Janeiro; and there was much truth and beauty in the remark of the Swiss, who, looking for the first time on the native splendor of the Brazilian Bay and its circlet of mountains, exclaimed, "C'est l'Helvétie Meridionale" (it is the Southern Switzerland).

What a glorious spectacle must have presented itself to those early navigators, De Solis, Majellan and Martin Affonso de Souza, who were the first Europeans that ever sailed through the narrow portal which constitutes the entrance to Nitheroby (Hidden Water), as those almost land-locked waters were appropriately and poetically termed by the Tamoya Indians. Though the mountain sides and borders of the bay are still richly and luxuriantly clothed, then all the primeval forests existed, and gave a wilder and more striking beauty to a scene, so enchanting in a natural point of view, even after three centuries of the encroachments of man.

We all of us know, either by our own experience or by that of others, how joyful is the sight of land to the tempest-tossed voyager. When the broad blue circle of sea and sky, which for days and weeks has encompassed his vision, is at length broken by a shore—even though that shore be bleak and desolate as the ice mountains of the Arctic regions—it is invested with a surpassing interest, it is robed in undreamed-of charms. What then must be the emotions of one who, coming from a latitude of stormy winter, gazes upon these bright shores and beholds around him a land of perpetual summer, with its towering and crested palms and its giant vegetation arrayed in fadeless green.

The first entrance of any one to the Bay of Rio de Janeire forms an era in his existence, for even the dullest observer must afterward cherish sublimer views of the manifold beauty and majesty of the works of the Creator. I have seen the most rude and ignorant Russian sailor, the immoral and unreflecting Australian adventurer, as well as the cultivated and refined European gentleman, stand silently, side by side, upon the deck, mutually admiring the gigantic avenues of mountains and prim-covered isles, which, like the granite pillars before the Temple of Luxor, form a fitting colonnade to the portal of this finest bay in the world.

On either side of that contracted entrance, as far as the eye can reach, bold, abrupt and beautiful, stretch away the mountains, whose pointed and fantastic shapes recall the glories of Alpland. On our left the "Sugar Loaf" stands like a giant sentinel to the metropolis of Brazil. The round and green summits of the Tres Irmaos (Three Brothers) are in strong contrast with the peaks of Conovado and Tijuca; while the Gavia rears its huge sail-like form, and half hides the fading line of mountains which extends to the very borders of Rio Grande del Sud. On the right, another lofty range of picturesque headlands stretches into the bold promontory well-known to all South Atlantic navigators as Cape Frio. Mighty rivers and virgin forests, palm trees and jaguars, anacondas and alligators, howling monkeys and screaming birds, diamond-mining, revolutions and earthquakes, are the component parts of the picture formed in the mind's eye, as we draw near to those bold and beautiful shores. By and by we discern with delight the peculiar bright-leaved woods of Brazil, with here and there the purple blooming quaresma tree; and when we observe that the snake-like cacti and rich flowering parasites shoot forth and hang down even from the jagged and precipitous sides of the "Sugar Loaf," and as we single out, in every nook and crevice, new evidences of a genial and prolific clime, emotion before overwhelmed by vastness of outline, now unburthens itself in every conceivable exclamation of surprise and admiration.

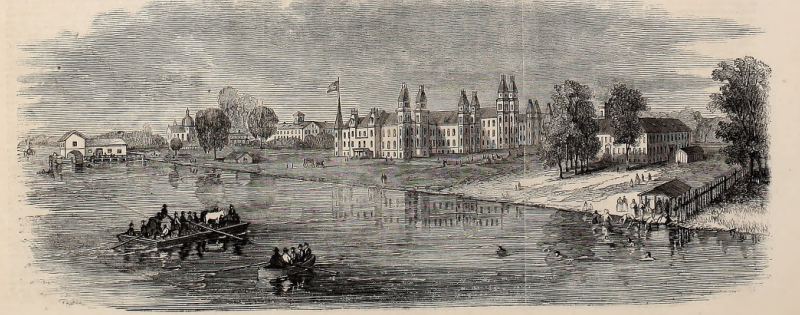
ICE CAVES.—A gentleman named Browne reports his personal investigation of 12 ice-caves in various parts of the Alps and the Jura. They all bear a pretty strong resemblance to each other. The one which had most reputation, until its frame was dimmed in consequence of the modern passion for the High Alps, was the cave known as the Schafloch, which is in the face of that one of the innumerable Swiss Rothhorne which looks down upon the lake of Thun. The cave at first enters the rock in a horizontal direction. It then makes a sharp turn at right angles to its former course, and the floor begins to descend rapidly. The way lies over a collection of huge boulders, amongst which ice gradually appears, and becomes gradually more prominent until at length a solid mass of ice is reached. Here Mr. Browne found two grand columns, rising on each side of the cave, and forming a kind of portal. The number and dimensions of these columns appear to vary considerably in different seasons. Mr. Browne cut his way into one, and found himself inside a dome-shaped cavity—the column, it seems, might more properly be compared in shape to a beehive, and is maintained by water dropping on to its head from the roof, and there freezing. The dome was not tall enough to permit of Mr. Browne's standing upright. The centre was occupied by "a complex mass of delicate icicles," leaving a narrow passage between them and the ice-wall, and said to be "exceedingly lovely." After investigating the wonders of this curious grotto, Mr. Browne advanced further down the icy stream, the breadth of which was something over 75 feet, until he come to the edge of a grand icefall, rolling down into a gulf of which it was impossible to distinguish the end. The surface of the ice in these caves is as different as possible from the rough and crumbling surface which generally gives such good footing on the open-air glacier. It is generally smooth, polished and slippery, as the newly-formed ice on an English pond. It was generally so clear that, as Mr. Browne mentions in another case, a sheet four or six inches thick was no hindrance to a view of the rock upon which it was formed, and in some cases it was necessary to touch the ice before being certain of its existence. To descend an icefall of this kind is evidently a very different business from descending the fall of the Col du Géant, especially when you are totally ignorant as to what there may be at the bottom. By the help of a little step-cutting and a few useful corners of rock, Mr. Browne succeeded in circumventing the difficulty and reaching the icy lake at the foot of the descent. The total length of the fall appears to be 45 yards, and the lake was 28 yards by 14. The whole mass of ice was thus not unlike a miniature representation of the Rhone glacier, where the higher plateau is separated from the terminal lake into which the ice expands by the well known ice-cascade.

THE STATE EMIGRANTS' HOSPITAL, WARD'S ISLAND, EAST RIVER, N. Y.

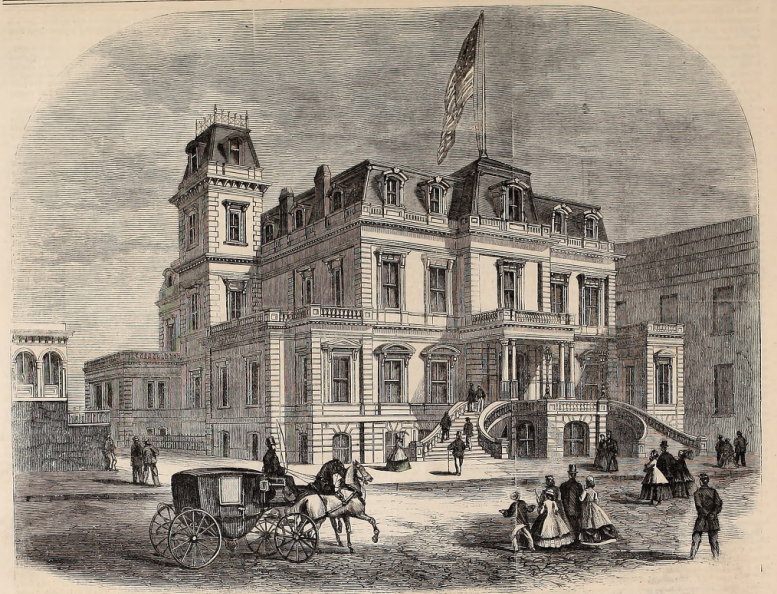
THE CRATER BEFORE PETERSBURG, VA.

On the 25th of June, 1864, while the Union forces were closely besieging the rebel army laying behind their entrenchments in front of Petersburg, Lieut. Col. Pleasants, 48th Penn., was ordered by Gen. Grant to detail his veteran miners to tunnel the earth from the exterior line of our works nearest the rebel lines, to a point immediately under one of the enemy's principal forts. The work was commenced and carried on with great secrecy, and on the morning of the 30th of July a tunnel 500 feet in length was completed—the termination, as directed, being under the rebel works. At the end of the tunnel there were two chambers, extending to the right and left, in which were placed six tons of powder, the explosion of which it was thought would so surprise and disorganize the rebels, that our troops could break their lines and march on Petersburg. On the 30th of July the mine was exploded, but owing to a want of co-operation on the part of the forces ordered to make the attack, or some misunderstanding which has never yet been satisfactorily explained, the enterprise proved a failure.

The illustration we present this week portrays the several points of interest connected with this great event of the war.



COTTON MILL ON WARD'S ISLAND, THE FIRST ERECTED IN NEW YORK STATE.



VIEW OF THE SICK WARD IN THE STATE EMIGRANTS' HOSPITAL, WARD'S ISLAND.

THE washerwoman of Holland and Belgium, so proverbially clean, and who get up their linen so beautifully white, use refined borax as a washing powder instead of soda, in the proportion of a large handful of borax powder to about 10 gallons of boiling water. They save in soap nearly one-half. All the large washing establishments adopt the same mode. For lawn, cambric, &c., an extra quantity of the powder is used. Borax, being a neutral salt, does not in the slightest degree injure the texture of the linen: its effects is to soften the hardest water, and therefore it should be kept on every toilet-table. To the taste it is rather sweet, is used for cleaning the hair, is an excellent dentifrice, and in hot countries is used with tartaric acid and bicarbonate of soda as a cooling beverage.

THE RETURN.

BY HIRAM E. GRIFFITH.

Oh! the hopes, and the faith, of a soldier's wife,
The faith, the hopes, and the tears,
And the weary watchings, and waitings, too,
Through all these dreadful years;
Watching, and waiting, and praying well,
That the battles may soon be o'er,
And he be back, ere the year has died,
To never leave her more.

Ah, well! those weary years have died,
And the dreary months have past,
And over the hills the gladsome wave,
On the homeward march at last;
And the breath of spring comes balmy up
To cheer them on their way,
And the soldier's wife, on bended knees,
Is blessing God to-day.

A tear, and a prayer, for the soldiers' wife,
Whose hopes are beyond the tomb,
Who, over the hills, to that better land,
Will be homeward marching soon—
Where a husband waits to welcome her,
And war shall never come,
Nor the steady tramp of Iron heels,
Nor the sound of martial drum.

Proud is your step, I know as you come,
Over the hills on the war-worn track,
But not more proud is your heart than mine,
As I wait here to welcome you back;

But not as proud is your heart or mine,
As the heart of the soldier's wife,
Who is watching to see her husband come,
From the battle and the strife.

THE FALL OF THE HOUSE IN —— STREET.

The House in —— Street.

BY LIZZIE CAMPBELL.

How I came into possession of the following manuscript I shall not stop to explain; it was not in any wonderful way, but simply and accidentally, and to describe the manner would only retard the story. Without further preface I place it before the reader.

HOWARD FALCON'S JOURNAL.

JULY 8th, 18—

Here I am, lodged in this curious old house, in —— street, a house that has always interested me, from the dark, mysterious and deserted atmosphere that seems to surround it. I remember shuddering, when I was a boy, long, long years ago, when I passed this house one day in my walks—that was before I lost my poor father. Alas! alas! my poor, dear father! Shall I ever be able to clear away that mystery? I shudder again at that thought. It is strange, but it is the same sort of shudder that shook me when I passed this house in my childhood—the feeling that old women tell us is a warning that some one is walking over the spot that will be our grave.

I'm afraid I am growing moody and hypochondriacal, and I have come to the last place on earth to cheer me. But I won't leave it—no, I will not give up my two comfortable rooms, though the house be gloomy. What a strange sort of fascination seems to chain me here! My extraordinary landlord is not the weakest link in that chain. I am not naturally curious, but I am devoured with curiosity about that man. As well as I can judge, there are no lodgers but myself in the roomy old house. How does my landlord live? If he had no more rooms than the two I rent, he can't be doing a thriving business. But, then, does he need to do much? Does he ever eat? During the week I have been here so much of cookery has reached me second-hand, so no smell of fish or roast —less meat. Has he a servant? I don't believe he has, though I never thought of it before. But, then, who can it be that every morning at nine o'clock who builds the fire on a rainy day? for I always have fire on rainy days, and it has rained twice since I have been here. She brought in the coals, gentle and left it outside my door on these two days? I shall be satisfied—I must have this cleared up, I will ring the bell, and then I'll see who answers it.

I am satisfied. I rang the bell, my landlord answered it, and wished to know what he could bring me. Clearly there was no servant. In my confusion I said a Methodist, and then changed my order to a pitcher of ice-water. He bowed, withdrew, and, returning in a few minutes, placed the pitcher on my table. He has a prepossessing face that man; his face was one of the reasons why I timed those rooms. I thought it a good face, steady, and it is more—it is wonderful. To-day I observed it more, even than on the first day I saw him. He is not my person (in spite of that) and I think he must have been handsome. He is tall, with a slight stoop in the shoulders, and very thin. His clothes are of good broadcloth, and worn with that peculiar air that always stamps the wearer as a gentleman, and my landlord has about him that indefinable, unmistakeable something that says he is a gentleman. His face is fearfully pale, and so dark that the cheek bones seem ready to cut their way through the transparent skin. Strange to say, his face is not wrinkled; it has the pallor of death and the smoothness of marble, and his deep, dark blue eyes are like caverns, in which burn dim lights, sunk far back in his face; they are ringed about with circles of a deep, dark black color, and his hair, snow-white, falls to his shoulders in long, unshorn ringlets. His thumbnail and middle finger, as I saw him performing one of the duties of a menial, and I hastened to say something apologetic.

"You must not have troubled yourself, Mr. Falconridge," I said. "I could have waited the return of your servant."

"I am my own servant," he made answer, and his tones were cold and frozen like ice.

He closed the door mistakenly, and with out the footfalls I heard him descending the stairs.

For a few minutes I fell uncomfortable; and when I thought he might have gone from sight and ear, I could not help adding to my question. "Does he ever eat?" two others, "Does he ever drink?" and "Does he ever sleep?"

JULY 20th.

Eleven days have passed, and I have not once visited that chamber of mirth, who never sees without a murmur, all the jottings down of my variable moods. Why? Something happened, and I have not had, unable to rise from it till to-day. Let me think—my recollections of that something are still dim and hazy. Ah! now it comes to me. A young girl—a lovely girl, with a cloud of waving, curling, bright hair falling round her shoulders, and shaded by a broad hat; then a rushing sound as from the ocean, a quick, piercing cry from the girl, and a firmament of stars, blackness, nothing, and—I know no more. When I recover I am lying here in my own room, a redbird face is looking down at me, then I try to speak, but the beautiful mouth outlines a silver, sweet voice says "Hush!" and I am dumb.

Then Beauty seems repentant of her stern edict, and revokes it with

"At least you must not speak above your breath only a word—a single question, if you like."

Then I don't say "Where am I," as they do in the novels, because I know quite well; but I desire very earnestly to hear "Is he in the world I came there, and what the matter in?"

"When you saved my life, that dreadful day, we thought the horse had killed you," she dolefully blew on the head—and I nearly—I—that is—I wasn't in the least hurt. I begged them to bring you here, and they did so devotes in the city, and it turned out you lived here."

"Just how curious—"

"No, no," I said one question, and I promised the doctor—you really must be good, or else he won't trust me again."

"Is not one—"

"Well—one; that can't do much harm."

"How long have I been here?"

"Precisely a week; this is the seventh day."

"And you—"

"No; positively now, you must say no more. This time I'm serious."

I closed my lips obediently. She sat down—for the first moment she had been speaking she was standing up—and I contemplated her with wonder and delight. Her curious and half-frightened, if a woman waiting on me in the capacity of nurse, I could scarcely realise it; and so young and lovely. And she was nervous about me anything distinctly; but becoming a trifle heartstoned to the novel situation in which I found myself, I began to take quietly to my mind the strangeness and beauty of the girl sitting there, so calm, so dignified, with folded, snowy hands and meditative face.

She was torn to the promise she had given the doctor, and didn't allow me to speak ten more words in the course of the day. But she couldn't prevent my busy mind from weaving a hundred fantastical romances about her. Who was she—who was she—and how did she seem so perfectly at home in my mysterious lodging house.

It was with surprise of the most manifested kind that I learned she was the daughter of my landlord, just returned from a foreign boarding-school, and coming home with her maid, on the day I saved her life, to surprise her father with an unexpected appearance.

Day by day I grew stronger, till at last I was able to be about again, and at length to confide to this true friend all the doings and sayings of the time that has elapsed since I last recorded here my daily experience. What change the presence of Helen Falconbridge has wrought in this still, dreary old house.

Now, for dismal silence, is the ringing voice and the sweet laughter of youth; and all things through the gloomy old halls is constantly to be seen the graceful form of my hosts daughter, in the fairy garments of young girlhood, or the rich and jauntily dressed figure of her maid. That the change is pleasing to me I will not attempt to deny, and that it is equally so to that strange old man is plainly visible.

He certainly worships his daughter; she seems the one joy, the one bright spot in his lonely existence. It is touching to see the tender motion of his hands when they unclasp from the chair-back the warm glow in his cold, white face, and steely eyes, when he gazes fondly in her young and beautiful countenance.

AUGUST 1st.

I am often requested now to join the family at tea; the request always comes from Helen. "Papa," I said Helen!—well, why not? It is a sweet name, and she is a sweet girl. Helen, then, the request always come from Helen, and I never refuse. It is pleasant to all opposite that lovely face, pleasant to sit and watch the play of those rosy lips when she says, "Another cup of tea, Mr. Falcon?" Pleasant to smile and answer back, and receive from her a bright look and a dainty cup with its fragrant contents, and to wonder what it is that makes it all seem so endearing—so all myself what is that mysterious aroma never felt before at the proxy tea-table—that smell of music has suddenly broken through the simple monotony of my life, and what is the allegoine?

I have asked myself these questions so often; and my heart has answered with a sudden thrill, till at last and suddenly it all plain to me.

Ah, fair Helen, sweet Helen Falconbridge, dear—my Helen, dear and dearest of all the world to me!

AUGUST 3d.

When I had written those last words I paused to look up from my writing, and my eyes swept over again, and realized more plainly what I had done. Seven years ago I dedicated my life to the progress of my genius, and I closed it to love; my heart true and single to its trust, and now at last, after so long, a woman's face has stolen in, and all else is forgotten, and I love her. Ah, hell! not be! I will be true to that solemn oath —that dread mystery shall be cleared away, and then, indeed, I may speak to her of the one theme of love.

Busy dreams of love! Fool that I am, when for me may be nothing but the little grief of disappointment—the aches of roses may be all there is for me to gather. Yet I am not a man to be otherwise, for small reason indeed have I to hope that Helen Falconbridge loves me. Away with this boyish folly and let me be a man again.

AUGUST 7th.

I couldn't write it before—it was all so new and strangely sweet—but I said to my own self here "Peace—peace, be still. This is a dream, from which, when you awoke, you will grow mad to find reality." But I am awake now—I—I—and I real—she loves me. Her own dear voice has said it; her own dear lips have sealed the words with a kiss. I am mad with my heart, and counted the quick beating of her heart while it throbbed against my own. I never meant to tell her; I never meant to speak words of love, her, and if need were, to go far away where I should never see her again. But she came down the corridor and towards the front door with the instinct to be out, alone in the vast crowd, I thought as I passed before. Suddenly I put out my arms towards her; unconsciously they closed about her, and pressed her close to me as though mine, and I—I—I—I—I—I—I—I—I—I—I places death. Shall I ever forget the half shy, half angry glance that shot at me from her dear eyes? I should never see it again, I thought, as I gave her me courage to tell all them. I drew her into the parlor, and like a long past dead I suddenly remembered my love-power forth and deluged her. She grasped and panted for breath—she drew herself from me—she cowered, but she put out little hands in mine, and trying to look my sanely at me she dropped the modest lids over her great blue eyes, and half hid her face with its ripples, trying to be calm, and I was answered better than with words. And by-and-by words were not wanted to tell me that she loved me, and that she was my own, for ever and ever my own.

AUGUST 10th.

I have thought of it all the day long—thought of it dreamily, with a sad heart, and a sad face, and Helen asked me many times where all my bright looks had gone to, and I said, by-and-by, into my little parlor an hour ago she said, seating herself on the cool old ottoman and resting her arm on my knee.

"Howard, if you don't tell me what it is that troubles you so, I will never again believe that you love me."

And then I smoothed back the bright hair from her brow, and said, with a sad smile,

"Do you wish to hear a sad story, Helen?'

"Yes, Howard," she said, "if it saddens you, for I would weep when you weep, and rejoice when you rejoice."

Then you shall know what threw a cloud over my life, Helen, seven years ago, and always shadows me now—at times more gloomily than at others. When I was a young child my mother died. I can just faintly remember her as a creature so beautiful that I often wondered whether she was not one of the angels sent down to stay with us a little while to foreshadow the beauty of heaven; my father was passionately and tenderly attached to her; and her death almost drove him mad. I have since learned that he married her against the wish of his father, and was, in consequence disinherited of a magnificent estate, and of all the honors belonging to him as eldest son. His younger brother was preferred to his place, and being unlike, from the peculiar disposition of the property, to my father's junior, he made him a liberal allowance, which enabled him with his wife, to emigrate to this country, where I was born. After my mother's death, from which my father slowly and partially recovered, he was wholly devoted to me; and spent his entire time and attention in the education of my genius, and me in every way. My uncle had had no son, and my father had, I believe, at ill-founded idea that I should inherit his property as well as that of my ancestors. For this reason he took much pains to fit me for what he fondly anticipated as my future greatness. In this way we lived till I attained my nineteenth year. At this time we resided in a sweet little cottage surrounded in vines and roses, and situated on the edge of the city. We kept no valuables in the house, and were never particularly careful about fastening the doors at night, having lived for many years in undisturbed quiet. One August—it was the 12th, Helen, exactly seven years ago last August—I started up here at about the evening somewhat earlier than usual, as I had been complaining of a severe headache—a species of pain to which I was subject, and which I had no subject from a child.

Our own household had already gone to bed, as we kept rural hours. I had fallen into an unsound sleep, from which I occasionally started up and awoke, and then fell asleep again in a sharper manner, to doze off again uncomfortably and unrefreshingly. When about ten o'clock, as nearly as I could ascertain, I started up here with a sudden awake, and found myself listening to the sound of voices. At first I thought I must have been dreaming, but the impression that I suppose myself to hear again, when I distinctly heard my father's voice, in loud and indignant tones:

"Villain, I say," he said, "it is impossible that you can be so unjust—so cruel—so villainous. It is the act of a thief, Edward, it is the act of a thief!"

The last words were almost drowned in the sudden explosion of a pistol-shot, and I sprang with a heavy fall. I was already half dressed, having begun to put on my clothes at the first words that had startled me, and before the sound of the pistol-shot had died away, I was in my father's room, and raising his bleeding form in my arms. I darted glances around the apartment shrewd by trace of a struggle, and there was no evidence of any one but my father having been in the room. My father was alone. On the appearance of the sleepy servant, I despatched her at once for assistance. Several of the neighbors were soon with us, but my dear father was mortally wounded, and already past speaking. Many hurried questions were addressed to him, as to how it had happened, but he could only faintly shake his head. Some one picked up the pistol; it was a single-barrel, and had evidently been discharged. Inquiring glances were directed at me. The person who had picked up the pistol, fixing his eyes sternly on me, addressed my father.

"Is your son the author of this sad business, Mr. Palcon?"

My father, in that effort of expiring strength, my dying father answered loudly, "no!" and the blood rushed from his mouth and nostrils, deluging me in his crimson stains, as he flung his arms around me, clasped me close to him, and dropped his head upon my shoulder. In that last dying moment I took an oath to discover the murderer.

"And you have never got any clue to the mystery since, Howard?" asked Helen.

"Never. I have often thought that I had a clue, but on following it to the end, nothing has ever come of it. I think I must have fallen into a doze. I was suddenly startled by a low, trembling noise, like the sound of distant thunder, followed by a rumbling sound, as though the house was shaken by a far-off convulsion of the earth."

Helen suddenly shuddered as I spoke, and said in an earnest voice:

"I too, heard and felt this. Howard."

"Then you will know that it was not the work of my fancy, Helen. When I became conscious of this noise, and the quaking of the house which followed it, I sprang up, and looked about, when by my unutterable horror and amazement, I beheld my murdered father extended on the floor, and opposite him was the door which was turned open, and in whose hand was held a pistol. Then clearing the air, was borne in on my ears the words:

"The white hand will not marry the daughter of your father's murderer!"

Helen uttered a sharp shriek, and sprang from my side, as if stung by a serpent. At the same moment, like an echo, I heard another cry, and another rushing of footsteps. I flew to the door, opened it, and peered into the passage, but all was clear—there was nothing there—and I returned to Helen, who had previously risen, and like an sayon leaf, and holding to the table for support.

"You are very cruel," she said, in a dying voice, "to frighten me with a wicked and foolish dream. But I know it was only to try my love—for you know I would die if anything separated me from you."

I sought her half fainting, and pallid as marble, in my arms, and blaming myself a thousand times for my cruelty, kissed the roses back to her cheeks, and vowed to love her for ever and ever, and to think no more of what must have been the half-crazed imagination of a man hot just roused from sleep.

MIDNIGHT.—At last—at last! Mystery no longer, and a revelation so dreadful, that I myself cry twenty years of a life, which must be henceforth most wretched, had I never learned it. Oh! how my heart throbs—how wild has been a half hour's tender search, then this dreary, awful discovery. My heart burns and my brain reels, and even as it is would have written something grim stretch in vain for that which they must never more encircle, Helen! Helen! Helen! my lost, lost Helen!

After parting with Helen, I retired to my own room, moody and wretched, my weary heart hightened by the memory of joyful—and perhaps her true love. I had but seated myself in my favorite arm-chair, and drawn forth this shield friend, on whose paper I felt a wish to pour out my full heart, when the door slowly unclosed, and Mr. Falconbridge glided in noiseless as a spirit. He spoke not a word, but seated himself in the chair opposite me, and fixed his earnest, steady gaze upon me. Pale and deathly as he always was, it was now even more haggard than I had ever seen it; his thin lips were firmly closed, and there was a strange compressed look of light in his eyes. To break the silence which was becoming embarrassing, I said:

"I trust you will have the honor of your company this evening, Mr. Falconbridge."

He raised his hand and slightly waved it from him, and in a low, grating sable my words.

"Howard Falcon!" he said, "listen to me; let not a word escape you till I am about to escape you. I was a listener to your conversation with my daughter this evening, and I tell you now, and let you know it for the first time, that you are villain her—that never in all time can she become your wife."

I smiled—smiled in the proud confidence of her love—feeling that nothing could ever separate us while that lasted.

"You may smile at what I am saying to you," Mr. Falconbridge said sternly, "do you hear me say that my daughter can never be your wife, you may smile now before the day dawns, Mr. Falcon, and you must make me a solemn oath never to attempt to hold converse or communion with Helen."

"I cannot do this, Mr. Falconbridge. I don't know what your reason may be for wishing to separate me from my daughter and repeating that we are devotedly attached to each other; but it is cruel and unnatural, and I will never consent to sacrifice my own happiness and Helen's for what may be but a selfish whim."

"You will know why I separate you?" he asked, in a low, hissing voice. "Is it so! Look, young man, look!"—he stretched out his slender white right hand—"look at the hand which took away your father's life."

I was overwhelmed—my heart ceased to beat, and I sat like one turned to stone by some mother; and then, from ceasing to love, I grew to hate my own brother, whose very heart had come secretly between me and my own. I took every means of revenge that lay in my power; I succeeded in my endeavors to make my father disinherit Ralph, and make me his heir instead, but Ralph suspected that I had dealt unfairly by him. When my father died and I succeeded, I was seized with regret for the part I had played, and to soothe my upbraiding conscience, I made him the offer of a share of my fortune, but would have no country. He was too completely absorbed in the joy of having won his wife, who was truly worth a thousand inheritances, to think much of the loss he had sustained, and he gladly accepted my offer. They settled in Liverpool. In due time two sons were born, and then Ralph seemed, for the first time, to realise that he had lost one of the finest estates in England. He wrote to me, and begged me to call suspicious into bitter, cutting words, and concluding by the hope that I would rest content with having robbed him, and do him justice. I had married, but, having then no prospect of children, I had already thought of making Ralph's eldest son my heir, in case I died without issue.

Sixteen years passed—during which time letters frequently passed between us, and our old love seemed to revive.

Then your mother's death, and in the year following, the birth of my little Helen, whose mother only lived long enough to place her in my arms.

"From that hour I retracted my promise to make you my heir, for I then thought—to my bitter grief—that the most brilliant and accomplished heiress in Britain. I did not yet dare to make known my determination to Ralph, and another year I delayed it, till Helen had reached the age of thirteen, at which time I sent her to a French convent for educational purposes. Being thus left alone, and very miserable in her absence, the old love for Ralph revived more strongly than ever. My heart yearned to see my brother again, and I sailed for America.

"On the passage I decided on the manner in which I should break to him the change in my intentions with regard to yourself. I would propose to make Helen my heiress, and to adhere to the two cousins—my daughter and yourself—and thus heal all the breach between us.

"After some difficulty, owing to his having abridged his name, I at length found Ralph—found him alone on that ill-fated summer-night. It was a storming interview—he flew into the wildest rage on hearing of Helen's existence, of which he had not known till then, and utterly refused the proposed alliance, declaring he would never trammel upon your free will, by any promise, or bargain, of the kind. He insisted, in circumstory tones, that I should make you my heir—threatened to contest our dead father's will—brandied me with treachery—characterized my conduct as injustice—as robbery—till, at length, stung by his wrong, I reached the pistol which lay on the table—aimed it at threat only, with no more thought of murder, as I hope for mercy in heaven—than I have this moment. It went off in my hand, and I was a murderer.

"By what instinct I leaped through the open window, closed it after me, and escaped so, I know not; but with all my sad heart, I have known ever since that Ralph's dead face has pursued me, and, sleeping or waking, its death groan is for ever sounding in my ears."

This, then, was my father's murderer—this man before me. I thought of that fact only at first; all else that he had said I put aside. I rose—I had my hands upon him with the weight of murderously I made him move not—in a deep, terrible voice I denounced him, and threatened to take his life then and there if he resisted. He shrank away from me, a quick convulsion passed over him, and then he said:

"I am Helen's father!"

My hands fell from him, as if withered. In the first of that appeal I could do nothing—was impotently regarding him. As soon as my faculties awakened again, I thought:

"He revealed this to separate me from Helen. Clearly he never once thought he was confessing himself a murderer. Helen's father! Heaven pity me, and show me what I ought to do!"

Presently he spoke:

"I make no attempt to escape; truly I did not think of it; for I never dreamed that you would be the one to bring Helen's father to the scaffold. But do as you will; I will not take the first step towards escape. You will find me here in the morning; take the rest of the night to reflect. I am guilty of murder—I murdered your dead blood without the wish of my heart; and God knows what bitter penance I have paid. For seven years I did not look upon the face of my child—for seven years I lived here the life of an anchorite, bewailing the sins of my past life, with what sincerity let those whitened locks and this sad face testify. To-e the rest of the night to consider. Howard, deliver me up to justice if you will—think of Helen—and pity me if you can. Adieu."

I saw him—alone with a secret more terrible than death—alone with my thoughts of Helen, with my blighted heart, with my wretched love—the more turned to grief, hatter sullen.

From mere force of habit, for something to still the twitching of my fingers, I write it all here. For something to ease the aching pain within my soul I here call upon her on whom I must never look again, I here utter the love I may never more breathe in her ears. Oh, Helen, Helen, my love! Oh, Helen, my one, only darling—my own, my own, lost—

The Journal abruptly ended. I gave a sigh of disappointment, for I was dissatisfied not to have the conclusion of it. Then I sent only Townsend how the manuscript had come into my possession.

A certain dilapidated house, in ——— street, had startled all the neighborhood, one night, by quite a terrible crash. From the ruins had been dug forth three bodies, that of a white-haired old man, a young man, whose hand clutched a roll of paper, and a beautiful young girl, whose bright hair shed a golden glitter over her white, dead face.

A young woman, who had had leave to pass the night with some friends, identified the bodies as those of her mistress, Miss Helen Hamilton, the young lady's father, and a young man named Falcon, who had lodged with them.

A friend of mine, who knew my fondness for curious papers, had procured for me the manuscript, had before the reader as "Howard Falcon's Journal."

"How did you manage it?"

"By leading you to the altar."

"CAST DOWN BUT NOT DESTROYED."

BY PAUL NORTH.

On, sweet spring days, wherein the sun,
His golden gladness deep has planted!
Oh, bonding sky, whose fair-off blue,
At night with ghostly moon is haunted!

Oh, running rills, and limpid lakes,
Oh, ocean, silent, silent never!
Oh, tardy tide that dost their waves
Gainst rocks that beat them back for ever!

Oh, rustic daffodils, that bud,
And catch the yellow sunlight's quiver,
Make our dull senses leap in bliss,
And in the breezes shine and shiver!

Oh, gloesome birds with gleaming wing,
And songs that make the echoes listen!
Oh, southern winds whose messages
Like tender kisses fall and glisten.

Oh, nature! mother earth! thy charms
Seem now but marks to morials given,
For grief has dimmed a nation's eye,
A nation's heart with pain is riven.

We see not sky, nor golden sun;
We know not flowers, nor tuneful birds;
We know not if the tides be out,
Or waves with foam the gray rocks sprinkle.

We see no sight, we hear no sound,
We know no thought unsinged with sadness,
For grief has dimmed a nation's heart,
That only late had thrilled with gladness.

Oh blessed beyond our country's best!
Whose honor ne'er with shame was tainted,
Who here fell, in a righteous cause,
Was doubly cursed and doubly sainted.

Oh, bere, crowned at the dawn
Of glorious freedom's peaceful morning!
Oh, patriot with the heart and voice,
Pure prayer to temp'rate Nation's yearning.

Oh, statesman that on truth's clear side,
Did'st never doubt, nor pause, nor falter!
Oh, Christian, furnace-proved, and tried,
By time's hot touch, on ware's red altar.

Our God demanded one life more,
To sanctify the nation's living—
He yielded his, and even so
He blessed his country in its giving.

And as up freedom's beeling heights,
Our country trade in quickened being—
In his all shall be the noon bright,
To light the path beyond our seeing.

GUY'S FOLLY;

OR,

The Secret of Thornton Heath.

CHAPTER XXIII.—CONCLUSION.

THE conference between Guy Raymond and Walter was a short one.

The position in which the latter found himself was far too difficult to allow of any discussion on his part.

"Walter," said Guy Raymond, "you have behaved very ill to me. Have you any excuse to offer?"

This speech gave Walter courage.

"Excuse!" he said. "Yes, indeed I have excuse. My patrimony you took from me; it is mine still, and I believe you think you would restore it to me."

"Not at all," returned his uncle—"not so. The terms of the will were precise; I have but complied with them. You have not been justified in taking the law into your own hands."

Walter did not answer.

"You have forfeited everything by your conduct," continued his uncle, "and still I am willing to forgive everything, on one condition. I am the more inclined to forgiveness, because I may have been unjust in running you so very much against your inclination."

"And what is the condition?" asked Walter.

"That you leave the country with your wife."

Walter laughed spitefully.

"And what if I refuse?" he said. "That is more easily said than done. Your forgiveness may be very pleasing to me, but it does not produce the means of leaving England."

"If forgiveness includes other things," returned Guy, "it includes the restoration to you of your patrimony. Give me the required promise, that you will quit England within a month, and I will at once sign the paper necessary to your possession of his property."

"I give the promise freely, and at once," said Walter.

"Will your wife consent?"

"Will she be but too glad to go," returned he. He guessed that in her then state of mind the time I will leave England for ever. The country has become distasteful to me; its memories are bitter; it speaks to me of error and crime, and I would gladly welcome a new land which would remind me of nothing. So, believe me, I am sincere."

"Good, then!" said Guy Raymond. "Whither will you direct your steps?"

"To America."

His uncle inserted a few words in a document already drawn up.

"Very well," he said, handing him two papers. "There is a cheque for a hundred pounds, which will carry you and your wife across; and there is an order on the bank at New York, to pay to your credit the sum of twenty thousand pounds."

At one time Walter would have received this merely as his due; he now received it, after his crime—his terrible crime—with gratitude, and almost tears.

Walter had spoken truly as regarded Ellie.

She was delighted at the prospect of leaving England—for to her England was Thornton, and an escape from it was an escape from all its associations and dangers.

Three weeks after the interview with Gideon Crawleigh, Guy, Ellie, and Walter sailed for New York, where they settled in happiness and prosperity.

Three days after, another important event took place at Thornton.

This was the marriage of Ralph St. Clare and Claudia, which, though unseen and unnoticed, poor Mrs. Freefield was present.

Mary Thorne discovered, alas! too quickly, how erroneously she had bestowed her heart.

Though thanking her earnestly for the method in which he had been restored to his home, the first words which Ralph uttered, were words expressive of his deep love for Claudia, and the gladness of his heart at discovering that she had recovered her senses.

It was now, for the first time, that he had mentioned Claudia's name, and how Mary questioned him about her, he poured forth to her the whole tale of his love—never knowing the pallor which overspread her face—never heeding the bowing of her bosom, and the nervous clenching of her hands—never dreaming that her heart was filled with tears, and her whole being agitated with intense emotion.

Poor Mary! she never after this gave him an opportunity of observing her love for him; but on the contrary, took a special delight in aiding him in his plan to win Claudia for his wife.

And when, at length, the lovers were united, she was present at the ceremony, and went through the ordeal bravely.

She did not, however, remain an old maid. Such a beautiful and loving creature as she was, it would have been sorely indeed to devote to a life of single blessedness.

About a year after the union of Ralph and Claudia, she was united to a young man who had long loved her in vain, and she has never had reason to regret the decision.

Guy Raymond lived but a short time after this, and his property fell, as by his will, to Claudia, who gave the greater portion to Mrs. Freefield, who, through so many years had tended her like a mother.

Sir Robert Arbuthnot and his newly recovered wife removed to London, after his wounds were healed, and he and Claudia recovered her health, and her son is now one of the richest men in his county.

Lady Jane considered it prudent to drop her name and pretensions, and married Mr. P. A. David, the lawyer; while Arthur and two of his sisters, retired to Devon upon the allowance made by their father, and married happily and well.

Arthur, indeed, had a great lesson that night, when, return ng from the criminal errand, he saw his mother endeavoring to destroy his father's life; and, from that fatal opportunity, he also intended a messenger to Mrs. Cassel, bidding her to allow her prisoner to escape, and to keep out of the way herself, to avoid questioning.

There is one character, however, yet unprovided for—a character in which, it may be, that my readers will take an interest, and about which, therefore, I am bound to say a few words.

This was Clara Arbuthnot.

Herself, Heyward, his father, was one of those men who, having no respect whatever for woman's virtue, considers that the female sex are created specially for man's enjoyment, and that man, therefore, possesses a right to dispose of them as he likes.

Clara loved Heyward, he went through the ceremony of marriage with Clara, it was merely because he considered it would be convenient to do so.

He had been struck by the beauty of Clara—more, he it said, by the beauty of her form than by the beauty of her mind; and, having conceived a passion for her, he had resolved to make her his own; but he had never imagined it possible that such a beautiful creature could endure long enough to up with her as a wife.

So he had engaged a man who stated himself to be a poor clergyman, who had lost his orchilaren, and had paid him well for his trouble.

A month passed by in this way. Denzil Harcourt was delighted with the beauty of his bride, who seemed to develop into graces every day, and began to regard the possibility of his ever undoing her for longer than he had ever imagined, when one evening the servant announced that the Rev. John Tollemache desired to see him.

He gave orders for his immediate admission, and in a few moments the clergyman appeared before him.

"You are surprised to see me, no doubt?" he said.

"Yes, indeed," returned Denzil Harcourt, "I am surprised. I imagined that by this time you were far away."

"I should have been had my own wishes been consulted," returned Tollemache; "but circumstances have compelled me to prevail. However, I am glad now that I did not go, since it enables me to fulfill a duty."

"What is that?"

"A duty I owe to you and Mrs. Harcourt. Nay, start not—she is your wife. You engaged me to deceive her; I deceived you. I told you I was unable to marry you—I was able; and your marriage with the proper signatures and witnesses, is duly registered."

Denzil Harcourt uttered a loud curse—not that he was disgusted at finding himself the lawful husband of Clara, but because he was angry at being thus outwitted.

"Why did you thus deceive me?" he cried. "Am you aware of the consequences of your treachery?"

"I am not, except in one way. I know that it has secured peace and home to one who would have been degraded and wretched before; and were you a man, you would thank me for what I have done."

"Thank you? I do not thank you!" cried Denzil Harcourt furiously. "Leave the house this moment, lest I eject you by force!"

As he spoke these words, a low, moaning cry was heard without; and springing out and opening the door, Denzil sensed out into the passage just in time to behold a white figure flying away towards the staircase.

He had no trouble in recognizing this as the form of his wife, and he instantly started in pursuit.

When John Tollemache entered the garden gate Clara was from the window, and hurried down stairs.

Not that she had any idea as to why she did so, but there was in her mind a kind of vague resentment that he had something to tell her.

She saw him, however, enter the drawing-room as she descended, and heard him close the door, the lock, and with the presentiment still upon her, she stood and listened at the door.

The words which the clergyman uttered roused a new feeling entirely in her mind, and the words which followed from her husband seemed to close the eyes of her reason to the light of day.

It was then that, with a moaning cry, she sank down upon the ground, and in another moment was flying along the passage.

At the end of the passage was a trap-door, beneath which was a full of some fifteen feet upon hard stone, and it was towards this Clara now bent her steps.

She was not covered to her intolerable, since the one she had trusted had turned out to be a deceiver, and it was with the intention of putting herself out of her misery that she had come hurried headlong into the black and yawning gulf.

Denzil Harcourt arrived on the brink just in time to see the white garments fattering in the air; and, without a thought of anything but the necessity of saving her—without one remembrance of his late selfish speeches, he rushed precipitately after her, and strove to effect her rescue.

By the light of the lamps which gleamed down from the river terrace he saw the face of her he loved so well, and the white hands of her by the dusky waves.

Should he ever again see that face instinct with life? Would that bosom never again be pressed with his own? Would her sweet voice never again speak to him in terms of love?

These were the thoughts which rushed through his brain as he beheld her, and with eager arms he plunged in the stream.

At length he reached her—at length his arm encircled her waist—at length he once more felt her living body, weighing over a repentant husband, and thanking Providence that it had given him a trial which brought to her such great joy.

Clara and Denzil Harcourt are now one of the happiest couples, if we except that couple down at Thornton, who reaped so great a degree of happiness at last from the strange perseverance of GUY'S FOLLY.

THE END.

ANVIL ROCK, S. C.

Of the many objects of interest in the State of South Carolina, Anvil Rock will soon be considered the most rare. Situated on the main road running between Charleston and Columbia, it is of easy access, and thousands of lovers of nature's freaks visit it yearly. The stone is of immense proportions, standing nearly fifteen feet high, and is shaped almost exactly like a blacksmith's anvil.

THE OLD STONE MANSION, RICHMOND, VA.

FORTUNATELY for the history of the late rebel capital, many of the old landmarks of the city were preserved in the incendiary flames of the traitors upon their evacuation of the city. There are but few sites that bind Richmond to the past more strongly than the old Stone Mansion, the first house built within the present city limits. This and yet picturesque weathering into a handsome ruin, now that the war is over, and hundreds of people daily make their pilgrimage to the venerable edifice.

WHIPPING STOCKS IN GOLDSBORO, N. C.

Since the grand march of Gen. Sherman's army through the heart of the State of South Carolina—the scenes of barbarism once so actively used by the slave holder, have become objects of curiosity. Among these are the public whipping stocks in Goldsboro, N. C., where slaves were punished by order of their masters. We have before us a faithful illustration of this ancient and now decaying means of torture.

THE NEW MARKET, RICHMOND, VA.

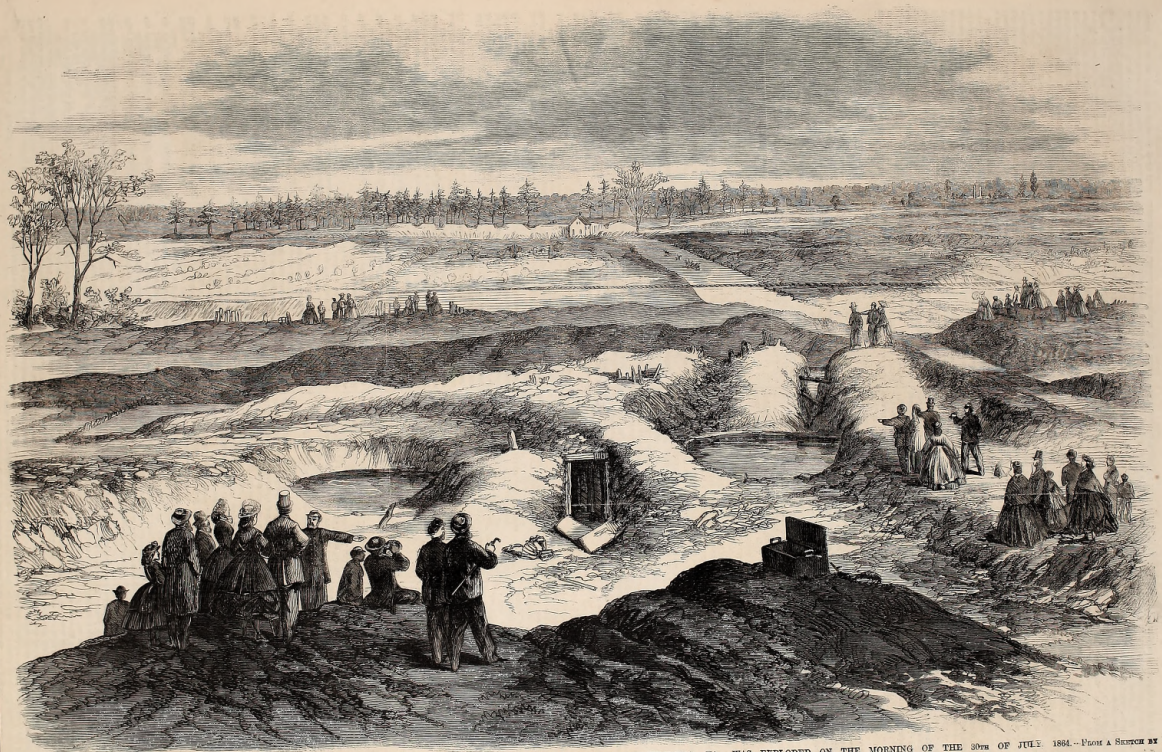
PROBABLY one of the strongest contrasts between the present when Richmond was in the hands of the rebels and the present time may be found in the appearance of her markets then and now. Our special Artist has sent us an interesting sketch, which we publish this week, of the new market in Richmond, giving a view of the busy scenes there daily enacted.

THERE'S a great difference between honor and honesty; the honest, it is said, exist among themselves, but the honorable among all.

THE CELEBRATION OF NEW YEAR'S DAY BY THE JAPANESE IN YOKOHAM, JAPAN.

VIEW ON JAMES RIVER, VA.

A SINGULAR feature of the mind developes itself on the close of every excitement. No sooner has the immediate wonder past, than oblivion spreads its gentle film gradually over the event, until it loses all its point and brightness. Still, as a record of the past, there can be few things more interesting than illustrations of the closing acts of the great drama which culminated at Bushvill. Our sketch represents the river before Fort Darling, that word which once was considered as representing a second Gibraltar. Gen. Grant knew, however, perfectly well that to storm Fort Darling would be an useless waste of life; and, like a wise caersal, he left it to fall when the city it was press and to defend fell. The spot our Artist has portrayed is about nine miles from Richmond, on the south side of the James.



NEW YEAR'S DAY IN JAPAN.

As a contrast to our own New Year's customs, we give a sketch of the doings indulged by the double-sworded, swarthy denizens of Japan, who rejoice in the hari hari, and other singular diversions. A letter from an artist who resides at Yokohama will explain the subject of the cut:

"I send you a sketch of the celebration of the Japanese New Year, the first three days of which are devoted to games of every kind, played by old and young. Their most characteristic performance is the game of battledore and shuttlecock. The battledore is made of solid wood, with the picture of a man or woman on the reverse side; the shuttlecock is something like ours, but very much smaller, and having a little round piece of lead, in which the feathers are fixed. All day long, in the street, before every shop and house door, you see laughing groups of people engaged in this sport, and the fun waxes hot and furious, while every miss is punished by applying the battledore rather sharply to that part of the human frame known to schoolboys as the natural enemy of the birch. The girls, of course, don't test it; for the simple reason that they wear their bustles outside their dress. But how jolly it is to see a whole town so pleasantly enjoying itself—that is to say, the people of the town, for, of course, the town can't possibly enjoy itself; but that's of no consequence to the subjects. In no other country have I ever seen such hearty popular enjoyment. The streets, too, look very pretty, being decorated with bamboos and fir-trees; and, as everybody is in full dress, the taste of the Japanese for harmonious colors is displayed to such a degree of perfection that M. Chevreuil, the author of the treatise on that subject, would entirely approve of their costumes. Meantime, the boys walk on stilts, with their sticks held between their big toe and first toe; or they divert themselves with kites, tops, hoops and other toys. Then you meet a procession of officers, in butterfly wings, going to pay visits, and bowing to the ground, but the sketch I send renders any description unnecessary. In a word, the Japanese are a most singularly absurd people, and they don't know it; but possibly the same may be said of all nations."

THE MUSTERING OUT.

BY J. W. WATSON.

To the warbling of banners and crashing of drums,
The proud sweeping columns in majesty comes.
Columbia has called to her children afar,
"Come home from the battle, come home from the war!"
And they came from the south, and they came from the west,
In the glory-stained garb of their servitude dressed;
For grander to show in its dust-covered hue,
Than in garments of silk and cerulean hue.

They came in their thousands, they came in their might,
On their lips a new song, in their eyes a new light.
On the banks of Potomac they swarm like the bees,
Rolling in as the billows roll in from the seas.
Through the day and the night, with unvarying tramp,
With shouting and singing they surge on the camp.
Their chanting of welcome, their singing of home,
Rise up like the mists that rise out of the foam.

The swamps of Cyrenee, the Cumberland hills,
The green Shenandoah its component fills—
From the glades of Savannah, from Donaldson's walls,
From Shiloh and Vicksburg, from Charleston's proud halls,
From the soil of Virginia, made sacred by blood,
They come like the waves of a fast-rolling flood,
With a mournful thought in each battle-stained eye,
Of ruin and want, as their columns sweep by.

They know that in homes through the far reaching south,
The millions are waiting that marshaled them forth.
They know there are hearts stretched out from the west
To welcome them each as a much honored guest.
That bird of the morning, and carnivorous rest
That shall woo them to sleep in the arms they love best.
And this is the song they are singing about,
The joys that are waiting their mustering out.

And many a veteran, sun-browned and scarred,
As he sleeps in his tent, or walks lonely on guard;
In his sleeping or waking, hath dreams of the day,
So soon to succeed the battle array.
He shall march the last time, with a proud Cashing eye,
And hear from his neighbors the welcoming cry—
Shall clasp to his heart, the loved children and wife,
And draw from their happiness fresh-given life.

When the voice of the nation cried out in alarm,
They wanted no urging, no asking, to arm.
They came from the valleys, the hills and the plain,
They doubled and trebled and trebled again.
From the banks of Potomac, like rays from the sun,
They flashed their dread shafts till their mission was done.
On the banks of Potomac they gather once more;
Their mission is peace and their memory war.

God grant, in his mercy, good rest to the brave,
May the rest in their homes be a rest till the grave.
They have fought the good fight, and the victory's won.

Let us pray that for ever the fighting is done.
Only this in reserve, should an arrogant foe,
By a word, or a look, ever hint at a blow;
Let us spring to our arms, without halt, without doubt,
And, for a mustering in, and a mustering out.

Bound to the Wheel.

CHAPTER I.—THE VAGRANT'S DANCE.

Within two hours of sunset, when the London sparrows had already begun to chirp a desultory anthem in many chimney grates; and an organ-grinder planted the opening pillar of his organ, a stick, in the middle of the street, and yawned up at the quartered windows that looked down back the light upon each other—when the white road, and whiter pavement, and still whiter steps, vied with each other in glaring heat, and parasol dogs never loitered, but flew on as if every step burned them—at this hour, one June day, a blaze of brilliant colors appeared at the corner of the street.

It was a basket of cut flowers, carried by one of a party of vagrant children. There were five of them, four girls and a boy, and they had been sent into the street to rest, while their older companions refreshed themselves at a neighboring gin-palace. The girls, with their brown skins and cunning, almond-shaped, black eyes, might have been gipsies. Their crushed bonnets might have lain between their black braids and the green turf many a starlit night, and might be many another without the possibility of their becoming any worse. The prettiest of the four was in some trouble about her foot, into which a piece of broken glass had penetrated; and the boy ran in front of her, making her limping gait and her grimaces.

The party halted at a doorstep, opposite the organman, when the boy annoyed by tumbling over head and heels all round him, and by running under the organ, while the girls sat down their flowers and held a consultation over the wounded foot.

It was evidently a baffling case, and after many a shrill summons to the boy to come and help in the inspection, he was seized, and with much kicking and scratching and laughter, was dragged to the step where the little patient sat, and presented him her first triumphantly.

Apparently he felt it useless to resist, so he took the foot between his hands, and gravely view it. A handsome, cunning-looking little head it was. The over-fond sun had tanned its ivory curls to the color of Cheltenham purses, and had left a tinge visible on the cheeks and eyelids in bright freckles, and had burned the full, square throat to brown that the shoulders pushed out of a slit in his shirt, appeared like snow beneath in contrast. On the left shoulder the wound for which he limped, a tanned le f, and as he spanned her foot from it, the little finger-nails dinted into his flesh. Of this pain this stoical boy took no notice, and the slightest notice, as intent was he on performing the operation successfully. Amid a low buzz of admiration, he drew the bit of glass from the wound, and held it up to view. A strip of hass was then unbound from one of the bouquets and tied about the foot, and while the dancing began the organ-man set to and turned his back contemptuously on the little ragamuffins, began playing an old dance tune, full of life and vivacity.

There is a movement on the step, the foot is withdrawn impatiently from the encircling fingers, and the little figure rises and presently is standing on the pavement, holding up its ragged skirt, and stepping to the music like a leader to the three other girls, and, two facing two, they begin to dance.

What manner of dance it may be it is impossible to say; but the hare, brown feet, flayed with the sun and dust of a long summer's day, are pattering the flat London pavement as lightly as if they were a marble floor of Pompeii. The boy, meantime, is lying at length on his head, his head just above the edge of the kerbstone, propped on his two elbows, and his glittering eye following their every movement.

Wonderful are the outlines of the flying rags, the waving arms, the animated faces! Wild as it is, there is a real sort of beauty in the dance, though it is difficult to trace it. There are steps so buoyant, as full of joy as the step of Jephtah's daughter about to meet her father returning to meet the conqueror. There are fits of languor, when the opera, oiled figures mock the voluptuous attitudes of Mohammedan houris. The father and the dark almond eyes, and revealing their wealth of clustering little tendrils of blackness. There are fits of stimulated rage, of savage Indian-like onslaught, when hounds fall off and rags fly out like the tears of Iris in a shower. There are fits of graciousness, when nothing can exceed the dainty propriety of step and gesture, when the skirts might be touched so gently as the folds of the lily arms decked with bracelets of diamonds and gold, so consciously graceful, so full of the sense of beauty they are the unconscious exponents of.

The organ man has for some time been watching the dance, with a glance of increasing gratified, changing to a wild smile, for he sees himself a child among them, in his little sooner license, dancing in the streets. His father and the old father of his little playmates worked, and where his mother and baby sister came to meet them at twilight. He sees himself a child among the grapeshoes, and the music he plays changes to the merry harvesters's pipes. He is no longer a deformed organ-grinder, dirty, wretched, but he is a child with his mother and father in his own bright valley.

He bends his head on his breast, and the children still dance, and the dance seems to become to them a mystic, wild rite, for the dancers' faces have lost joys and sorrows of their vagrant life, the fears and the hopes, the hidden thoughts, never, perhaps, to have a part of a new existence.

Shorter-lived, however, is their delight than the flowers that make so gorgeous a centre to the picture. An angry voice is heard from within, and it is over. The girls rush to the edge of the kerbstone and cower down by the basket. The Italian feels upon his leg, for he knows that he leaves have ceased to fan him; he yawns, shoulders his organ, and goes away, muttering on oath to think he has been playing to boys without pay, and cursed a single copper.

The man and woman coming down the street are quarreling; the children see in an instant what silent, and stare at the boy and giggle. They are now him their companion, and he springs to his feet and joined them of his own accord, and had been allowed to make his home among them during the great Bankrupt Fair, when he made their fires and cooked for them. But the fair has been over these three days, the last of the profits has just been spent in gin, and the boy must not be sent about his business. The man gives him to understand this in brief, if not very choice words, and bids the girls "Take up their rags and come along!" They obey, grinning and nodding at the boy. The woman, however, only stoops to take a hank, pulls the torn shirt over the bare shoulder and pins it, with a decent womanly charge, as if she were returning him to his mother.

Yet well she knows the only mother he has is the one on whose hard bosom he will sleep to-night, the one who will many times bitch him, and breath will nevertheless blow coldly on his tit-tied head. Yet, with her rough nature, this woman has scorched him with her summer sun, buffeted him with wind and hail, and pushed him with her bitter taunts—will she murmur at the piggy woman's care for him?

He stands looking after the retreating figures, as the woman follows her husband and the girls with great strides. He looks after them, and there are two streaks of fit on the little face that were not there before. Are they tears? Tears of despair at his utter loneliness, of regret at losing his wayside companions, on whose knees his homeless head has found a quieter sleep than he had ever known before; whose wayward friendliness has given point to the driest meal; whose finger-nails had left their prints on more places than the now hearing shoulder?

The boy vagrant weeps. But how scornfully would he laugh were he told that these things caused his tears. He has no thought but that his pain is simply for the time his late companions are laughing at him, and thinking he is suffering grief on account of his dismissal. He is watching them with quick, sidelong glance to see them turn round; not—so his attitude says—that he cares whether they look at him or not, but because he wishes to see if they are talking about him, and if so, what they may say of him.

He has his wish. At the corner of the street the woman halts, and looks at him. He runs towards them, the man advances threateningly, the little outcast almost meets him, then stops short, and turns, shrinking. Defiant look, he pitches himself upon one hand, and rolls back in form of a wheel, after the most approved style of a city ragamuffin.

When about the middle of the short street he has been again reached, he stops, erects himself, and looks back. Yes, they are gone—quite gone! He then takes his lonely way in an opposite direction, with hanging head and gutter, he has not been long up before him the first there collected, and making the best of the coolness. He plods on, thinking no more of it as if he knew all that turnings by heart, till the greatest is left behind, and the sun stretches out lazy, sword-like beams, as if to how itself a tomb in the grey west.

CHAPTER II.—A HAUNTED GARDEN.

Within a branch fall of cherries, which he had pulled from a tree that hung over an outside wall, for his fare, a clump of rushes for his throne, the field of river-bank for his footstool, and the sunset for his supper, the little wayfarer—for by far that was his name—sat down to eat his own dog supper.

His shirt, which he had washed in the river, was hung by the sleeve to weave two high tree boughs, large fish, and his head, and his Egyptian merrily in the evening breeze. He enjoyed his cherries, and enjoyed shooting the stones on the other side of the river to the different spots on the river, waiting till all the circles had died away before allowing himself to take another mouthful. He was very hungry when he had begun, and had thrown the cherry branch into the river, and watched it float away with the tide, he put on his ragged little shirt, and set out once more on his journey.

For the last five days Ean had possessed a home. He had come to it in a lad's way (for by experience these for the London sellers be, in part) quite by chance. He had been tempted to climb the wall over a garden, and having alighted on the lawn had found himself in what struck him as being a new and exquisite land. A large mansion, before which, had he happened to enter it by day, he would assuredly have been roughly driven. So deeply impressed was the little vagrant with its beauty and stillness, and the sort of uncontrolled possession he had of it for the time, that he was half afraid to step on the lawn—moist and silvered with dew and moonlight—should reveal his every step to some eyes that would be sure to report that he grass had been having heard during the day that the pump belonged to nothing more supernatural than a fairy. He crept about, as he roamed up and down the silent paths at leisure. The standard roses, with beds of white and creamy yellow, of pink and white, and of deep red, full of burning and hard crimson, filled him with wondering pleasure as he passed them, and then in the slight breeze, and sent to him remembrance of a perfume that he could not identify yet seemed to know—at once so sweet and so strong. The grass lay as it had, in accordance with the modeling gift of the tilled lady, who, sitting at tea outside a fancy little Swiss cottage, about an acre off, had directed and first after the invasion of their day—came to the lad's imagination as he did not from that time and sold porcelain cup, which he held by the grimy hands, and gazed at the while with unshrinking look on the bold, handsome face. He was a woman poppy seemed to him, standing erect among these brilliant beauties of the earth. The vagrant's quick imitativeness took form, like a piece of antique sculpture; its bold limbs, hanging from their curved stalks, resisting the gentle breeze, as they had resisted those of the sun, with a stronger imperturbability. He had no idea, when he saw it on the first night, but that it had attained its present perfection; but when the next night found its splendid eyes wide open, he could scarcely repress an exclamation of wonder and delight.

During the day he picked up a fact concerning the middle girl, namely, that of his, that name and its fascination grew on him ever. Their wonderful fact was that as sooner in boyhood had been poor, very poor, and that by hard work and indomitable resolution he had become what he now was—the richest man in Bamberg, an alderman, and, what was infinitely more to Ean, the possessor of this fairy garden.

Ean wanted to get a glimpse of him, for the alderman was ill, and the blinds were down all day at the windows. No matter. Ean was the less likely to be received, as he still came and touched the roses, and chewed the young peas, and fed the hard green fruits with which the overhanging boughs were laden. He was far too deeply impressed with the beauty of the garden, which he knew only in its night aspect and under the glory of the moon, to do any harm or damage to it. On one occasion the gardener, when he began to work in the morning, found a favorite plant, a hugh cactus, in a pot, that had evidently been upset and injured, but must carefully set to rights in a contest way by some mole, unskilful hands, the branches tied up, and the mould refreshed with water from the fountain.

As he came and went and scratch his head, and wondered if it were possible that the ghost of the alderman's pretty daughter, which people said haunted the latter in his walks for his cruelty, had transferred her attention to the garden she had so loved and tended; "if so, ghosts were uncommon selfish!"

This particular June night Ean's foot slipped twice in climbing the wall, and he seemed had he dropped down on the soft mould that lay between the wall and the overgrown, than he distinctly heard footsteps near. He crouched low, kept still, and peeped through the laurels.

Near on the lawn, which, bathed in dew and moonlight, looked more lovely and tender than ever, he could see the house, which was like a number of gray stone towers, placed side by side, the two end ones projecting boldly forward like short wings, so as to form a little square sourt-yard in the centre.

Shortly after he recognised the voice of the nightingale singing in the tall elms to the rear of the house; and soon after a wistful look seemed, he was assured if he had been mistaken about hearing the steps.

He did not wonder long. There appeared suddenly on the ground line, in the opening between the laurels, a pair of rough shod feet. They stood still, and Ean saw by the white cloth there and for so long a time, that he thought he should know them again, even among a thousand other feet.

At last they stirred: and following them with his eyes, Ean caught sight of another pair, shuffling and dragging the edge of the cloth to meet the first pair.

"Both," said the owner of these, "you've been licking it easy, ain't you, now?"

"Don't be a hare!" was the rejoinder. "I told you I'd make it all right in the long run. How?"

And Ean heard him spit, as if in contempt.

"How lays the ground now, then?" asked the first speaker, after a pause.

"Why, the young gent's in the room with it, grubbing over papers. We must steer ourselves clear of the light, and by-and-by we can see what we can watch the winder. Walk on the flowers, cust'ye. Don't make that row on the gravel."

Peering round the evergreens, Ean saw them making for the ordered at the back of the house. His first impulse was to escape the scrape as quickly as possible, lest he might be laid hold of as "one of 'em," but on second thoughts, seeing the house so profoundly hushed, with not the window open to the hot June night, he bounded across the lawn. On reaching the graveled terrace, about a foot shuffling, he saw at one corner a window on the ground floor with a light in it. He went and looked in.

It was a quiet, sub-paneled room, and seemed to belong to the housekeeper, for there were banners of clean linen standing about, and a long shelf full of preserves pots across the wall. A stout and rather aged woman, in a mob cap, sat knitting and ruling at a young girl who was stitching.

A mouthful of bread, and butter, poised the easy-eating, as Ean came to the window. "I'll tell you when my lady, I'll give an end to this pudding shop, as sure as I've the ill-luck to be your godmother. Wee bottle you, if you were a child o' mine, and work, work, work, and nursery, and bullets from an upstart who has no more right to the money than your poor silly self! A pretty handful you got of it, with the master sick nigh at death's door, and poor Mr. Anthony away and all, and you going on like this."

"Holly, Mrs. Spiffen!" is now almost shouted each time; and the women are started out of their seances by seeing Ean's flushed and angry figure thrust halfway in the window. "Let the gal alone, can't yer, and mind your own business. There's thieves in the air. Dye hear? Good-night!"

CHAPTER III.—DRIVING DEATH.

For the last few minutes Alderman Mandle had turned his face to the wall, and seemed to sleep. His hand, large-boned and thin, rested tranquilly in the coverlid; and his face, with its high, grey, and massive brow, and pale, hollow cheeks, were, for the first time for many hours, a look of calm repose.

But the alderman did not sleep. He had merely fallen into that state of extreme exhaustion which sudden relief from pain so often produces. He lay perfectly still, his face to the polished wall, and his eyes, peering out from under his bushy brows and grey lashes, were watching with the persevering and remarkable obstinacy of disease, a shadow which, on account of its minute-like motion in the first moments of release from suffering, there is generally an expectation in the heart—a regret for harsh words uttered during the throes of agony, and an intense desire for sympathy. The alderman, wicked as he was by temper, habit and disposition, was feeling this as he watched the shadow of his nephew moving about in gentle and noiseless attendance upon him, and he tried to feel pleasure in his noiseless and thoughtful movements. He saw the shadow stoop, and noiselessly pick up the books and papers which he, the alderman, had flung to different parts of the room in his fits of rage and pain. He saw him muffle the old Dutch tump-piece with cloths, so that even the constant tick might be moderated in sound, and his mind had to feel satisfied with the change. He saw him move the little oil lamp to the top of a distant bureau, and pile the curtains across the foot of the bed to shut out the light. And then, as last, he saw him sit still at the bedside. And surely never shadow was so full of profound veneration and loving anxiety as that shadow's original, as it bent low and lower, and then stooped in silent contemplation, hiding its sails.

The alderman lowered his eyelids still more, but he did not cease to watch the shadow. His soft, good-looking profile showed well upon the wall, and the alderman found an unpleasant inclination to study its every move assiduously then ever, as if to compare it with the fast gathering impressions of his own mind, which had of late become gone a great change. The figure was extremely slim, without being at all lean; and it was so much the same size from shoulders to foot, and so softly rounded in every part, that as it sat down on the edge of the bed, the old man could not get over the notion that it was something of the appearance of a gigantic worm striving to sit upright. The very finger tips, from the constant biting way of the nails, were not unlike worm heads.

But here the alderman shut his eyes and compressed his lips tightly, asking himself, with a sort of remorseful twinge, if he could call up no better thoughts than these of his sister's niece, and the companion of his latest hours. He struggled with himself to stretch out his hand, and say, "Good night, Dick, my boy! Are you sleepy after so much watching?" And he did manage to draw his arm out of bed, and rest his head on the pillow; but the movement caused Richard Sleuth's head—smoothing strongly of scented oils—to come down heavily upon his hand. He could not help it; he doing so he intended, he suddenly found himself sitting bolt upright, thundering out:

"Confound you, Dick! I can't stand it any longer! Upon my soul, I can't! Hang me if I wouldn't rather be accused to death with Anthony's creaking boots and deathening way of knocking against everything he comes near, or poisoned by his abominable cookery, than I'd have you sit there wriggling and slinking about, and bringing the whole chemist's shop under my nose, as you do!"

The young man recoiled, and shoved his white teeth, and then—as if he fancied the reproof was leveled at his bending down so much about the bed—sat up a little and crossed himself, and then acute erected himself differently, as if to do it better; and there was something of the most serious terror in it. It was done, that completed, to the alderman's ungoverned fancy, the image he had called up. His worm was standing on its head, and had nine its body, and bridling and showing its teeth, and all with that ridiculous smile on its face! The alderman's manner greatly changed, and he burst into a fit of laughter, which made his shoulder so for some time shake the clothes, after the sound had ceased. After a little while he said:

"Dick, I can sleep now, I think. You had better use his chair yourself. Put the hand-bell near me; if you hear it, come. Till you do, don't. Set your door slightly ajar, but don't leave it wide open, or I shall hear you snoring."

"Do I snore, uncle?" asked Sleuth, in a gentle surprise.

"What don't you do that a gentleman shouldn't? Eh? Never mind, Dick. There, your fault, if we're both of us ill disposed in each other's way."

"I'm sorry, uncle, if I've vexed you. I'm sure I've tried my best."

"You have, Dick, you have! Give me your hand. I shan't forget that, my boy."

Dick gave his hand, but seemed hardly to venture on it, and only hesitatingly responding to the uncle's strong and manly grasp, so that the alderman again got the uncomfortable feeling that he had made a previously absurd the shape and likeness of those damp gingers, and he let them fall abruptly.

Richard Sleuth moved to go away, in obedience to his uncle's commands. He slept, when sleep was near, in the alderman's dressing-room, and was joining. Before he went, he cast a careful, anxious glance in every direction, as if to remind himself of every possible article. There seemed only one thing to do—to place a fresh bottle of the ordinal within the alderman's reach, on a little table that stood beside the bed.

"Where that, Dick?" said the alderman, with his face turned in the opposite direction.

"Only the cordial, uncle—a fresh bottle, in case you should want it."

"Didn't you hear the doctor say I wasn't to touch it, if I could possibly help it?"

"Yes, uncle."

"Then why the d— don't you mind! Would you like to get rid of me before my time?"

"Oh, uncle!" exclaimed Sleuth; and there was certainly something akin to reproach in the sad, soft sound that accompanied his words.

"Take it away, then."

"To be sure, uncle!"

"There, let it alone! I say perish before ever of you come to me, if my physicians come on again, and I can't get at the bottle. But I know that drinking it's like drinking death. Pretest exactspeaker and I'll be dead help me!"

Sleuth went into the dressing-room, and the old man listened, while to his every motion. He heard him shake his coat as he took it off, preparatory to changing it, as he had heard him do every night for weeks past, for Richard Sleuth was a model of orderly propriety and neatness; he heard him kneel down and pray, not as the old man fancied truly religious people ought to pray under such circumstances, so as to be heard only by God, but in a tone so audible that many of the words could be distinguished, and among them words of intercession for the poor sick uncle; he heard the self-approving cough which followed, as it always followed, the rising from the kneeling posture, and then, quite unnecessarily, he heard the bed creak and sway with nocturnal violence, for Richard Sleuth, instead of gliding into it, as he generally did, had thrown himself upon it and—barely. The old man wondered. Was he fatigued, or was he depressed? Surely he could not be angry.

Alderman Maude's intended sleep was now again delayed. He could not put his nephew out of his mind. Somehow he had been bitter to him; irritable, unkind. He had not a specific fault to lay to his charge. He had only for excuse an intense and hungry-nerved dislike. But he tried to check the current by a long up Dick's good points, whether of person or character; his good-looking countenance; his very affectionateness of disposition when he was allowed to develop himself in his own way; his glow of amiable feeling, always ready to be called forth on the slightest suitable occasion; and the honey-suggesting buzz of his voice when he was allowed to talk, which would go on for an hour when fairly started.

Had the alderman been wise to snub him so much? Had he not stimulated unnatural manifestations by depressing natural ones? These last, unlikely, were not to the alderman's taste, who, self-made, self-educated, had never studied, till too late, to make himself a gentleman, but had still a keen appreciation of what a gentleman ought to be.

But the alderman was of too impetuous and selfish a nature to continue long such reasoning with himself. Richard Sleuth was in the house, so he thrust the counterpane fringe he had been gathering, tassel by tassel, into his large hand, and, with a sudden jerk, put it to his throat, and a hot moisture in his eye, he asked himself, how it was that he had come to be so hard upon the girl's love, in what he could not hide from himself was probably the twilight between life and death, and giving free and unchecked play to the fear of a woman, between whom and himself not one particle of sympathy ever had existed, or ever would exist. Ever? was it a fact? Was it not time to end it? and then, as answers to his questions, memory began showing picture after picture, which seemed to reach his eyes from them, burned in the darkness as if traced with fire.

The first is not an English picture. It is of the time when the alderman was a shipbroker at Ostend. He sees himself, with account books and papers strewn about him, neglected for the moment, and a beautiful baby with him, in order to take his little daughter or his knee, while he submits to be swept a fragrant shower of curls. Darkness or the light, the alderman sees the fair little head, with its arch nine eyes looking up into his own, expressive of the most perfect love and confidence, man, and the tiny, dimpled hand that he stoops to kiss as it heats time to the song.

The picture changes. Years are to be supposed to listen in the dressing-room to the alderman's breathing, he heard a smothered cry of—

"Oh, Dick! Dick!"

The next picture was an English lane, with a child entering it from a garden gate, and running from the hedges with her riding-whip, and turning to nod to him, her father, as he stands looking after her, displaying an expression of affection not as much as her beauty; but while he returns her joyous farewell, wipes the groom, with some strange misgiving, disappears from the heavenly sight.

That was the last time he ever saw her. The groom had obeyed him by running away with and marrying her, and eventually deserting her, and leaving her to die in the workhouse, which was her first and last appeals to the unforgiving alderman.

Then came two more pictures. In one he saw himself, years afterwards, receiving into his arms a boisterous and screaming boy, who, for the first few days of his visit, would not be pacified by caresses with passionate kicks, and shi the kites he made for him. It was his nephew, Anthony Maude, his dead sister's child, with his love for intense longing for the companionship of a child, and with the feeling that he could, with it, rear up all his pleasures of child companionship over again—he had taken and adopted as his heir. The boy grew fierce and idle, and was sent away from the house. The alderman sent him to school and then to college. On one of the young man's visits he was quarrelsome, and the alderman ended by leaving him as suddenly as his daughter had done —to be treated with like punishment.

The last picture was one the alderman saw beside that of the angry-faced, kicking boy, was a chemist's shop, at the door of which his carriage stood, and he, the alderman, hurried in, with a cringing, confused assistant—that assistant was Richard Sleuth.

* * * * *

The nephew was so little inclined to sleep as the uncle, though he had shown himself capable of a most unusual extraordinary way. After a long and deep pause, in which the bedclothes rose and fell with the regularity of a sleeping person, and with the breathing of the recumbent figure, the latter rose suddenly to a sitting posture, gazed keenly around the room, and then, as if satisfied, the bedclothes were hastily pushed aside, and Richard Sleuth stood in his night dress, shoeless and stockingless, yet in all other respects completely dressed.

He first set was to go to the outer door of the dressing-room, which opened on a corridor, and to turn the handle with exceeding care. He made the slightest possible noise in doing it, and then stood quite still, both hands glued to the handle, but his body twisted half round, in the direction of the uncle's chamber. No sound, however, issued thence; so, after a prolonged pause, the handle was let go, and the door held ready, a little open, for him to go out. But he seemed to wait for something; and to beguile the time, he fetched his hair and bottle, and touched carefully with the saturated edge of the cork that part of the fastening which he fancied had made the noise.

Suddenly he starts in alarm: has he relieved which he sees who it is—Phillis, the housekeeper; a god-daughter, and the alderman's housemaid. Although she seems to tell him news that has greatly excited the two women, there is a greeting for a moment which shows Phillis and Richard Sleuth had expected this encounter.

Noting his finger on his lip, Phillis moves on with him in silence, till they reach the far end of the corridor.

"Oh Richard!" she begins. "Such a fright! There are thieves about—"

"Thieves, my dear?" repeats Sleuth, in a tone which would have failed to let the pistol fall, and give the alderman the benefit of the explosion.

The alderman was at the door—one unlike any he had ever before seen on his nephew's face, and he thought about it, and was troubled by it.

"Yes," said Phillis, as he held it, to cock it, to take it off the cock, and to fire it. Pooh! c'ye think I mean to let go the trigger?"

"Now, then," he said, "you are ill, and with your finger on—"

"Do you understand? Can you manage, if you see the occasion?"

"I never handled one of these things before, my dear," said Sleuth, "but I can't afraid when I see how."

"And do you see how?"

"Yes."

"Go, then; look all over the house. Most likely it is the prank of a vagabond boy; but the chance is we have a gang—I must own that. As were in that profession myself, I should like to see the rascals in his, with the mealy wheel of am, and its defender, Dick Sleuth! Here, Dick, come closer—closer, confound you! Don you see my rubbing your nose into my face when I don't want you, and now—. There," he whispered, "the room where the safe is will be their mark, if they love anything."

"Ese, uncle. And wouldn't it be well, as things are so exposed there, if I were to bring you the contents of the safe?"

"Yes—go—go along. Don't hurry. Make quite sure before you come back."

* * * * *

Two minutes later, and both the men are reading documents that greatly interest them, and which have a certain connection with each other. Sleuth has not found the robbers, but he has found what he has hunted for day and night in every leisure moment; he has found in the safe, by the aid of Phillis's key, the sealed which the uncle drew up when illness first came to him, and in which he finds that every right previously by will given to Anthony is transferred to him.

"It is so! It is so! It is so," he ejaculated with a different emphasis at each repetition of the phrase, and looking as men usually do, not upwards in their thankfulness, but with a furtive, onward kind of glance, into futurity, the meaning of which we put into words that he did not venture to use—"If I can prevent him from destroying this, or making any new provisions—and he cannot, for he is dead—which while he lives, which cannot be long, nothing can shake me. This is mine. Mine! mine! mine!" He looked round with a kind of subdued awe upon the place.

At that same moment the alderman is saying to himself, while he is in a belief that his nephew is in peril—

"Yes, late as it is, it is not too late. John shall go to him—instantly." Then run the alderman's notes:

"DEAR ANTHONY,—I fear I shan't live long. Will you come? If so, you must make haste. Your friend you. ELIAS MAUDE."

BUNGALOWS IN INDIA.

The bungalows of Elsinah, high not in their primitive—for upon the first occupation of these remote jungles doors and windows were not considered necessary, a piazza, or frame of bamboo covered with grass, answering the purpose of both—are still sufficiently rude to be picturesque. We have heard of their notions of India from descriptions of the City of Palaces. Heavy, ill-aired doors, ensured over with dense coats of paint, shut out the interior from the influence of the cold, hot, and rainy seasons. The walls are mean and bare; no attempt at ornate effects are made or desired, the dashing of inexperienced workmen is more offensive to the eye than commonness whitewash. The floors are of brick, and, according to the different apartments, if there be any, are of the rudest description, and the small portion of furniture is of the plainest description, and continually requiring repair.

The intercourse between the brute denizens of the soil and their human neighbors is of too close a nature to be agreeable. If the doors be left open at night, whereby the cool night air may not be withheld, to keep out the wolves and hyenas, which take the liberty of prowling around the house, or towards the gardens are the haunts of the porcupine, and panthers are frequent in the ravines. The sleeper, in search of a proof in the natives, the anomalous mixture of reverence of every description; but in large stations, which have long been under the British Government, the native, retreating to more desolate place s, are rarely seen; those that are left, in the immediate vicinity, form the population of the roof, and are comparative quiet beasts. In the jungle, on the contrary, they are more wild and more ravenous; wild cats, pleasingly picturesque in their bushing, are the pretext of how little dread others, take up their abode and dispute with the human occupants the possession of their grounds or prey. These last are the slightly striped tawny tigers, the bane of the hunter, by a shift, stretched across the path, or by a single bound, which can be covered by speed, but in a very incautious manner behind a horse, or by the cool lying down of the body, and shots out the unsightly rafters of the huge barn above the head of the sleeper, by a single stroke, or by the fore paw, the centre of the assailants and the resulting may be considered as the most favorable, while with the pressure of the dominions, shocking distance by the mangled limbs, and by a blow of the paw, which in three years, are frequently seen patrolling through some of the villages. The eagles are apt to carry off, during the rainy season, the young fowls, and the jackals, which are the scavengers of the country, are driven from its purlieus, falls through the yawning rent into the abyss below. Before the introduction of cattle, snakes and other agreeable visitants often dropped down into the bungalow. The presence of these was thought by reputable Hindoos; but although, where there are no cattle, the snakes are fewer and are driven to harmless the dwellers of the upper regions will seek the ground floor of their own accord, the cattle are not so accessible as to refuse.

Notwithstanding the intervention of the cotton canopy, however, it is in a quite sufficient manner without the trouble of a visit with the venetian; for night being usually the time for the visit of the deep to descend, he is invisible by their gambols. The noise is sometimes of the most terrific description, and the more particular, may fancy that the whole of the machinery, cloth, and contents, upon their devoted heads. The sparrows, and the bats, are followed by the kites, scared from their slumbers, and their chirping and fluttering increase the confusion. The crows will seldom infringement of the honest ease perform the part of the nocturnal disturbers of the peace, and are attended. A night's rest cannot usually commences, in which the treble is sustained by the mosquito, the bass by the grunting of the hogs, and the cries of the European beasts, while the base is crooked forth by the monkeys' hoots. The bugs, fleas, and the mosquitoes are discovered in the enormous, and the gunning and destructive powers of the latter are not to be distinguished. In the midst of this uproar, should sleep, nevertheless, succeed, at last upon the weary eyelids, it is but too often chased away by the yells of the wanderers, which, in the stillness of the night, are calculated to try to substitute his neighbour. A quiet night and a quiet day are equally difficult of attainment by the native, who sleep throughout the heat of the day, preferring the cool of the night for their labors. Should a horrible silence of the night succeed to the above, the sleeper will find the cattle pulled the roads, singing and shouting, and the bullocks at their work; a cry of part of discomfort in the room, grass and hiring train-ers, as well as the cattle, are in use of the sleeper to be populous.

Such is the usual character of a night in the jungles; and it requires nerves of no ordinary kind to support its various disturbances. The formidly of the bungalow is generally constructed and placed in India, afford a serious subject of consideration to the invaders. At a time of a dangerous wound boot, which gives so lively an idea of the Indian bungalow, is to be found in the city of Delhi, and is elevated to a considerable height from the ground, and is quite certainly, which is only 12 feet in all round, is only formed of the thinnest and most slender materials, and is by practically impossible to evacuate; and though hats may brain them with their wings, and though they may carry away their nests, and, in war, attack round the posts, admission to the interior of the bungalow is not to be obtained, and they form a great preservative which they form against malaria, it is not unusual to carry one's mosquito net at the season of the year.

WHAT is the difference between a cathedral and a mine? A cathedral is the seat of a bishop's see; a bishop's seat. Our word comes from the Greek καθεδρα, a seat. The more lucky letters from the bishop's seat plus the chief seat in the ancient Christian assembly, which was called καθεδρα. A minster is the chief church of a monastery or convent; its derivation is not the Saxon minster or register.

REV. HENRY E. MONTGOMERY, RECTOR OF THE CHURCH OF THE INCARNATION, CORNER OF MADISON AVENUE AND THIRTY-FIFTH STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

OLD STONE HOUSE, RICHMOND, VA., THE FIRST ERECTED IN THAT CITY.

CHURCH OF THE INCARNATION.

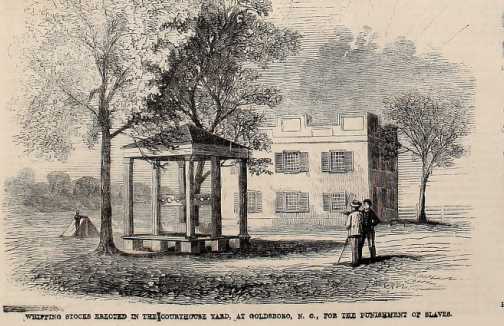
THE Church of the Incarnation, Rev. Henry E. Montgomery, D. D., Rector, is situated on the north-east corner of Madison avenue and 35th street. It covers, with the Sunday school building, a plot of ground 66 by 150 feet. The church is in the early decorated Gothic style, and is built of Newark light brown stone with lighter dressings from Brownhelm, Ohio; it consists of nave, aisles, chancel and tower.

The nave comprises seven bays, and is separated from the aisles by slender cast-iron columns which partially support the roof. The open roof is of stained chesnut. Around the capitals of the columns the gaslights are clustered.

The chancel is apsidal with a dome ceiling, partially filled with stained glass and partially plastered and painted a deep ultramarine tint, studded with constellations of golden stars. Below this the "Incarnation heart" is illuminated: and the walls are encrusted with a diaper pattern in plaster.

A superb metal corona of 24 gas jets gives light to the chancel.

The windows are all formed with delicately chiselled tracery of stone, and filled with exquisite stained glass, forming memorials of the dead of the congregation.



A sheltered porch opening into a vestibule gives access to the church; over this porch is an arcade of small arches, surmounted by the great west window.

The tower is at the corner, and is at present but partially finished; when completed it will rise to the height of 200 feet. In the tower is the staircase to the west gallery.

By the side of the chancel are the organ gallery and the vestry-room, and in the rear of it are the Bible class rooms, the infant school, the Sunday school and the library—all supplied with the fullest modern conveniences.

The furniture, pews, &c., are of chesnut, ash, and walnut combined, all oiled and polished, no varnish being used. The sculpture and plaster work are modeled after natural foliage; the oak, maple, gum, poplar, the rose, the convolvulus, the ivy, and many other trees and flowers add their petrified grace to the adornments of the sanctuary.

The church was built and paid for at once by the energy and able financial management of the rector and the building committee, and is overflowing with worshipers. It is in contemplation to finish the spire and build a rectory at an early day.

The cost, after the completion of the spire, will probably reach $200,000.

The architect is Mr. Emlen T. Little, of 111 Broadway.

Mr. Montgomery, the rector, was born in Philadelphia, and was educated for the legal profession. After a youthful tour in Europe he returned to the United States, and entered the General Theological Seminary. Receiving holy orders in 1846, he married the youngest daughter of John Lynch, of New York, and was for nine years rector of All Saints Church, Philadelphia. He has filled his present position most acceptably for ten years.

EMMA,

Queen Dowager of Hawaii.

IF Captain Cook, as he lay crying at Quiroa, could have had a vision of that island in 1865, no think astonishment would have triumphed over his last agonies. Among the wonders of the world has been the fact of a queen, dressed in the highest style of fashion, paying a visit, upon invitation, to the reigning Queen of Great Britain.

Emma, dowager Queen of Hawaii, is a very pleasing person, and is partially of white extraction. Through her mother's side, she is bought to the native chieftains, her father was a grandson of John Young, one of Van couver's companions. In 1856 she was married to Kame hameha, who died in 1863. Their only son having died in 1862, the throne was occupied by the late king's brother, who now reigns under the title of Kamehameha V. Queen Emma has been very carefully educated, and will not lose by a comparison with the aristocracy of Europe. She is a member of the Episcopal Church, and is very exemplary in her religious duties.

for architectural effect than is usually afforded in city buildings. The building has been executed in accordance with the design and under the superintendence of Mr. John Fraser, architect. The design is in the French Renaissance style, having the peculiar effect of hospitality belonging to that class of architecture, and none of the stern, forbidding aspect too common among the buildings of the present day. The façades are of granite, brick and brown stone, the base courses being of granite, the rest of the building is of brick, with the exception of the steps and main entrance, which are entirely of brown stone. The angles of the building have towers above rustic quoins, and the sills, architraves and pediments of the windows are of the same material. The entrance is approached from a platform, from each side of which broad flights of circular steps descend to the pavement; on the front of the platform, opposite the entrance, are four pedestals surmounted by columns in couplets, between the couplings there is a projection six feet in depth and twelve feet wide, which is surrounded by a balustrade; this is designed as a rostrum for public speakers. The column above spoken of supports a cornice and balustrade, which forms a balcony for the second story. The building is covered by a French or Mansard roof, above which rises a tower, twelve feet square, which stands in the centre of the front on Moravian street, and forms a picturesque break in the lines of the roof. The tower is to be surmounted by a vane of wrought iron, and railing of the same material. The rear façade looks on a spacious garden, and though not as elaborate as the front façade, nevertheless, as a subordinate front, its architecture is in accordance with the rest of the building.

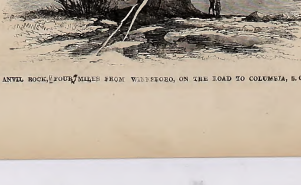
PUNISHMENT OF A NEGRO AT RICHMOND, VA.



WHILE one of our Artists was in Richmond, about a month ago, he witnessed a very correct and orderly proceeding, which was intended to punish a negro, who had stabbed a Federal soldier. As there was some doubt whether the accused had not been provoked beyond the average range of humanity, the authorities resolved to take a lenient view of the matter, and frighten rather than kill him. He was therefore informed that he was to be shot in his coffin. He was, consequently, put in one of those dreadful cases, open being left for the face, so that he might be left free to breathe the air of heaven. He was then placed up for the people to gaze on; after a time, having been thoroughly frightened into virtue, as Sancho would say, he was released—a better and a wiser man, let us hope.

ENTRANCE TO THE MINE BEFORE PETERSBURG, VA., AS IT APPEARED PREVIOUS TO THE EXPLOSION ON THE MORNING OF JULY 30.

THE NEW UNION LEAGUE HOUSE, PHILADELPHIA.

THIS fine structure is situated on a rectangular lot on the west side of Broad, in the square between Chestnut and Walnut streets. The front on Broad street is 100 feet, the sides are 200 feet. A better site for a building of this kind could not have been selected, occupying as it does, the highest ground in the city, and having at the same time the great advantage of a central position. The lot also being bounded on three sides by streets, gives a much greater opportunity only in the general tendency of the institution to develope the loyal sentiment of the North, but by the important actions of its military and publication committees. By the agency of the last, troops to the number of 15,000 or more have been recruited and sent into the ranks of the national armies. The expenditures of the committee have exceeded $125,000 for bounty and other recruiting expenses. The "Publication Committee," organized in the spring of 1863, has distributed an immense amount of valuable reading matter on a great variety of subjects bearing upon the vital questions of the hour, amounting to the issue of 2,000,000 documents, at a cost of over $40,000.

At the present time the Union League rooms a grand banquet was given by the members of the Club, which was one of the most brilliant affairs of the season.

The Union League have, since the suppression of the rebellion, extended their hospitalities to large numbers of our returning soldiers, and in consequence of the great service they have rendered the army, Generals, and the nation, have a great many claims to be numbered among the Union League and their families at the Union League rooms.

The following gentlemen fill the offices of the League at present: J. G. Fell, President; W. H. Aspinwall, Horace Binney, Jr., A. E. Borie, Morton McMichael, Vice Presidents; Geo. H. Boker, Secretary; James L. Claghorn, Treasurer.

LIFE AT SIERRA LEONE.

FROM January to December it is steamed, and dastened, and blown upon by all manner of vapors, and clouds, and showers. It is steamed and dastened to an almost daily heat: it is worried and terrified out of its usual propriety by the fierce electricity and tornadoes; it is trumbled upon at others by the far spread breath of the desert, charged with its impalpable sand, and the heat coldness and sand mingle at once. In other particulars it is very tropical indeed. It is deficient by blunder, blotched by fulsome, and sick with heat, and rains; it goes by rains, till the patience of Europeans runs to a close mould—for each of the seasons there is such as is known with the tropics only. But it has still greater failings. It is not the unhealthiest place—not certainly, yet a favorite enough possessor of those heats of the air, and rapid rains, and sudden and mighty the sunrise and the sunset come with the loud berlatings and roarings of their rejoicing or angered song, and which, at last a day, with sound or in silence, carry on their unceasing, musical, and unpretentious, your entire person and property. There are no gates or fast moats, you must in heat and ill at last be your own blood; complexion and symptom to stop possibly, and to name certainly; either to shrug the shoulders and mysterious hoop-ho-ho! lawyer saying all shall be well—or, if you are ready to gather up your pen and books, "making fine fuss-work" of total matter of another sovereign or, perhaps, of your own. It is the you scandalize by their unaccountable and unsolicited self-assurance, and the case to be conducted and distinguish your evening lights; cockroaches, also, both scrupulous and flying, whose wings are of a most precious; ants, red, black, and white, and brown, from whose no empire in any part of the house—bedroom, hall, or study—is safe. Besides these, a desirable and abundant assortment of bedsteads and beds; and lastly, sickness and death. With these last the Europeans become to be named his silent but inveterate and severe periods. But, to counter, though unmeeted the form with personality, it shows in its ocean's y suit even more than the smallest of the wood of Malabar, and is the truest and hinter are very similar to what are caused by the mosquito, only far reputed as a very much milder ally or substitute of that musical individual. Finally, to these positive or even may be added the less prominences, what are negations certainly, but negatives of a kind not to be considered as absences of the European's accustomed, if it be called so, of the native many absences of society, absence of books, absence whatever means requisite to have to reading, thinking and talking have.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

A GENTLEMAN rode up to a public-house in the country and called out:

"Who is the master of this house?"

"I am," replied the landlord; "my wife has been dead eleven years."

WHAT is the difference between a person tremulous with excitement and a young man in love? one is rested to the spot—the other rejected to the rest.

"CAN you inform me," said a student to the bookseller's wife, "what can and may be the difference of reason?"

"Yes, I dare say you will find it in the Course of Time."

A MAN being asked what he had had for dinner, replied: "A lean sole, and the ruin of me for sauce." On being asked for an explanation, he answered that the dinner consisted of a spare rib of pork and apple pie.

"PAPA, when are you going to buy me a solitaire, eh?"

"I don't know, my son; I can't afford it just now."

"I can't afford it. If you don't make haste, I'll go and cash the money, and make you pay me back, sir."

A BANKRUPT, youth was lamenting to his paternal progenitor, the ordeal of popping the question.

"Pooh!" said his father, "how do you suppose I managed?"

"You'd better tell," responded the hopeful, "you married mother, and I've got to marry a struggle girl!"

WHEN THE boy went back at school, a boy in the same class was asked by the teacher what was Samson's weakness.

"A woman, sir," said the boy.

"I don't know, my son," cried the teacher, "what example can you give of such a thing?"

"I can, sir," said the little model, "there's a verse in the Bible which says, 'they bound Samson with withes.'"

A THIEVES' editor spoke-ridiculed to his readers some what after this fashion: "We expected to have a death and a marriage to publish this week, but we have got no occasion for the wedding, and the doctor being taken sick himself, has neglected, and we are accordingly shorted out of both."

AT a medical examination a young aspirant for a doctor's diploma was asked:

"When does mortification ensue?"

Think of the examination his questioner must have felt when he gave the following answer:

"When you prescribe and are paished."

AT a large dinner party in a certain city, lately, the literary weather had done considerable duty in supplying conversation, when a plump, happy-looking married lady made a remark about cold feet. "Strange," said a lady opposite "Mrs. ——, you are not troubled with cold feet!" Amid an awful pause, she uttered, unawares, "Yes, indeed, I am very much troubled—but that is my husband's fault."

"BOYS," said Uncle Peter, as he examined the points of the beast, "I don't see but one reason why this nag won't trot her big." "What is that?" shouted a dozen voices.

SPECIAL FACTS.—That whisky is the key by which many gain an entrance into our prisons and asylums.

That tobacco brands the nose and of those who indulge, gotten their appetites.

That the habit is vague to take a winding way home.

That punch is the cause of many untimely puncises.

That lager beer is the cause of many a beer-ridge many to the bier.

That champagne is the cause of many real pains.

That gin slings have "slewed" more than the slings of fate.

WHY are suicides the most successful people in the world? Because they always accomplish their ends.

SWISS BEDDOES.—Every traveler in Switzerland is struck with the peculiarity of their bridges, which are mostly roofed in the same fashion as the inside, the use of which premises is not much seen at first, but on approaching the gorges of mountains, and especially the snow, which would otherwise block up their transit. There are many of these bridges, but the oldest of the bridges in the antiquated city of Lucerne, which is built entirely of wood, and is remarkable for having, at the end of one of the most picturesque lakes in all Europe, completely in all its wildness. They are three across the river Reuss, which, although it enters the lake at Lucerne a beautiful and transparent stream, after having passed through the lake, issues a beautiful sea of green water, which is the color of the waters of the lake of Lucerne. I know not why the flowing of a powerful river through a lake should produce such a change in color irresistibly; but so it was, that both here and at Geneva, where the Rhone flows through a similar lake, I could stand by the hour to look upon it. Against each end of the bridge is a picture representing some of the bridges. I think they call it the mill bridge, you know, because there is a mill at one end of it. The Switzerland Guide Book, however, gives no satisfactory account of the matter, which runs in a striking direction across the bridge. The frames, on one side from the eaves of the roof, on which describe the feats of the patron saints of Lucerne, and on the opposite side those which are employed in describing, historically, various scenes in Swiss history.

HINTS TO PURCHASERS OF PATENT STOVES, Ranges, Furnaces, &c.—Before you buy, it will be worth much to the unskilled public when in search of such articles, to call at 565 Broadway, and see Mr. Jewsbe's, but always insist upon seeing it at holdery who deals in nothing else. He will give you an infinitely larger choice at an infinitely lower price, and as you will find, a much better article. You have the whole advantage of your spec, which you have not when the article is bought from a shop-keeper who has a certain profit to sell. Finally, lay no store of any value without calling at 565 Broadway, for it is the only place you can be sure of getting the best article. Remember that none are the finest diamonds and rubies are cheaper than the inferior stones—Lapis, topaze, amethyste, turquoise, and garnets are very valuable when properly set. Diamond, being one used in quantities which render diamonds prices simple waste of money.

BEAUTIFUL COMPLEXION.

Ladies coming a beautiful, Clear and Smooth Complexion should use

GEORGE W. LAIRD'S

Bloom of Youth or Liquid Pearl.

This magnificent toilet article is entirely different from any other preparations of the purpose—it has no equal as a preserver and beautifier of the Complexion and Skin. Sold by all Druggists. Depot, 74 Fulton St.

CAUTION.

Since this valuable toilet article has been introduced, it has caused unprincipled persons to send forth a base imitation of the name, therefore be particular to see that the name (G. W. LAIRD) is stamped on the Bottle. None other is genuine.

The Atlantic Cable.

THE unpleasant intelligence of the probable failure of the Atlantic cable has reached us, and again the world is disappointed; for all men, of every nation, were either directly or indirectly interested in the success of the enterprise. The last news from the steamship Great Eastern is received through the English papers of the 4th August. They report that on the 2d, 1,200 miles of cable had been payed out, when the signals became unintelligible. How this news was received through the line (and it could apparently have been received in no other way) is not very clear. It is probably only a conjecture made by the electricians at Toilhommerum cliff, and so telegraphed to the English journals as an explanation of the inevitable silence.

We learn from Valentia Bay, under date August 4, that no communication has been had with the ship since, and no information received. The cause was unknown, and at the closing of this summary nothing additional had transpired. The land lines between Valentia had been out of order.

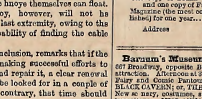
The London Times infers that the disaster occurred after the cable left the vessel, from the fact that it was unknown to those on board, who were signaling their messages as usual, when their signals became unintelligible at Valentia, and at last ceased entirely. As to the chances of recovering the impaired part of the cable and repairing it. It may be said that this process could not be accomplished at the rate of more than a quarter of a mile an hour, which the slightest wind or rough sea would at once put an end to. For such eventualities the Great Eastern is amply provided. She has several buoys on board, equal altogether to a weight of fifty tons, and she has at least five miles of powerful wire hemp rope, which can support all that the buoys themselves can float. This effort to buoy, however, will not be resorted to till the last extremity, owing to the danger and improbability of finding the cable again.

The Times, in conclusion, remarks that if the Great Eastern is making successful efforts to haul in the cable and repair it, a clear renewal of the signals may be looked for in a couple of days. If, on the contrary, that time should pass without the cable giving signals of life, we fear the case must be considered hopeless as far as regards success this year.

The following is the latest dispatch received at Londonderry, from London, on the 4th inst.:

LONDON, Friday, Aug. 4.



Communication with the Great Eastern remains unbroken. Nothing has been heard from her since noon of the 2d instant.

There is still hope, however, that the great Atlantic telegraph cable may yet prove a success, for it is possible that although communication ceased after twelve hundred miles of the line had been successfully laid, still, the cessation of the electric current may have been the result of accident, which can be repaired, if the exact spot at which insulation ceased be known. It is not improbable that the cable was damaged by the paying-out machinery, as was the case with the first in 1858. If such be the case, and the line be not entirely broken, it can be easily pulled in carefully spliced, and the work go on to successful completion. But it cannot be denied that the general interpretation of the case has created a feeling of deep regret and disappointment. It seemed the hopeful feeling we have so long indulged could not but be the precursor of success, and even to be compelled to indulge in a doubt, is painful. Although there is a cloud over the enterprise at present, it is not impossible the sky will yet be clear, and in our next issue we may have the pleasure of announcing that the Great Eastern was delayed on the ocean to repair an injury which exceted the present unpleasantness, but which being repaired, the vessel sped on to the successful landing of the cable on our shores.

CAUTION!

We would respectfully caution the public and our subscribers in the Western States against a woman styling herself Mrs. G. Lorenz, who is in the habit of ordering subscriptions and receiving money for Patterns, etc. She is an impostor. We have no traveling agents.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS OF FRANK LESLIE'S

NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold

Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture containing nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. This is the largest picture ever published for one penny. It is worth twenty cents.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and care fully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late, lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is stereotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 26, 1865.

All Communications, Books for Review, etc., must be addressed to FRANK LESLIE, 537 Pearl street, New York.

THE spirit of the bluff old fellow is to be admired, who, when leaving a hotel, being impressed by the pomp, asked: "Landlord, have I paid my bill?" "Yes, sir." "Well, then, why don't you pay your servants?"

SOUTHWORTH has described the rebel guerrilla Mosby, as a handsome man in personal appearance, with a fine figure, five feet ten inches in height, his build is good enough, but his face is very commonplace, and his light-brown hair, worn rather long, is straight, lank, and of no beauty. Mosby's features and expression would impress one as those of a man resolute and cunning, not supremely brave, nor virtuous, but such as we expect that in the stories of his cruelty, he has been somewhat belied.

A WARREN in the Tribune gives the names of seven Confederate vessels sold to British parties during the war, and adds that some three hundred more have been disposed of to citizens of neutral countries. Add to these the Florida and Alabama, and about half a million of tonnage, not to say accurate number, will be found. Webster says: "It is a sorrowful list to read, but it should serve our merchants to build up another marine with greater skill, and not so many old rattle-bladders stand ready; capital is plenty. The demand will soon be great, and in a national point of view it is a duty. Let the old sailing ships and breadstuffs will come in and seek a market across the ocean. Then let our merchants be ready to find the means for American tonnage —in which to transport it to those who have no long been reaping the benefits of our troubles."

THE University of Oxford, England, has recently awarded the "Chancellor's Prize" against the best English Essay, to Mr. Francis Allston Channing, son of the Rev. William Henry Channing, the distinguished pastor of the Unitarian Church in Washington. Mr. Channing has just completed academic education at Oxford, where he held a high rank in the classics and mathematics. He is one of the few Americans who have received the honors of that venerable institution. Indeed he is the first of our own countrymen who ever gained either of the great prizes of Oxford.

IN a late English magazine there is a description in the story of Miss Marjoribanks, of the accomplishments of an old lady, expressed in outward demeanor, of the man "about to propose." As our young lady receives many desire to know the full meaning of it, the whole passage is here set full. There was, it seems, in the demeanor of the visitor to Miss Marjoribanks, that something which is understood in the intercourse of the sexes, "she said," that little nervous cough, and pulled his cravat, and drew out his hat from his hat as if he had it all written down there, and locked as they always look."

NOTHING can exceed the brutality, we had almost said brutishness, of an English election. Our foreign exchanges tell us that at Carlisle "Mr. Lawson concluded his address amid a perfect shower of missiles, accompanied with the most terrific howlings." Mr. Fuller excelled in "amid a fusilade of powder and unclean things." When Mr. Hodgson presented himself, "the uproar became so terrible as to threaten serious consequences. Some one in the crowd discharged a pistol, and stones beginning to supply the place of soot and odors, etc., blood was drawn in several parts of the crowd. The Mayor, after frequently retiring to the town hall for momentary shelter, directed the police to clear the space in front of the hustings. The police endeavored to do so without effect, and the rioting continued, during which it was impossible for Mr. Hodgson to obtain a hearing." When it was announced that the "show of hands" was in favor of Mr. Hodgson, "the hustings was almost immediately cleared by missiles, the fever of the mob being shown with particular aim at the Mayor, who, with the other gentlemen on the hustings, was covered with powder of all colors, yellow, black, white and green. The candidate is more politely assailed, heavy bags of whiting and soot coming repeatedly in close fire, and but for the shelter of strong and friendly umbrellas, it must have resulted in serious personal injury. The proceedings were throughout of the most riotous and unseemly character; a constant shower of colored powder, rotten eggs, potatoes, rotten eggs and stale butchers' offal being poured upon the candidates and their friends."

IT is a fact that gunpowder would have furnished for a condemnation of "democratic institutions," had they taken place in Carlisle, Pennsylvania, instead of Carlisle, England.

WE presume the plan of "reconstruction" adopted by the Government is purely an experimental one, which will be abandoned when its failure becomes apparent. Sometimes in any plan or policy which proves inadequate or impossible, would be equally stupid and criminal. What evils those political men who already have, in principle so demonstrate that the present plan is equally unsuccessful, we can scarcely imagine. It is already known that a considerable part of the late elections in Virginia have been set aside by the military authorities, because it was notorious that the officers elected were chosen on the express ground that they had been active traitors, and were still in sympathy with the Government, as regarding the oath of allegiance prescribed by the amnesty proclamation as of no binding moral force. Such, for example, Gen. Turner tells us in his order setting aside the election, "were excluded on the ground of having lost their residence by absence in the service of or aid to the United States army during the rebellion, when no such ground was taken as against soldiers absent in like manner, and will but few exceptions, all of the officers elected were prominent and conspicuous in inaugurating and sustaining the rebellion."

IN South Carolina, also, it has been found requisite for the military authorities to prevent the complete re-establishment of the rebel authorities. It seems that Mr. Perry, the newly appointed Provisional Governor of that State, it will be remembered, regards Gen. Lee as next only to Washington, lately issued a proclamation reinstating all the rebel civil officers necessary to an election for a Conn stitutional Convention. Whereupon the late rebel sheriff of Charleston deliberately demanded of Gen. Beaumont, during the establishment of possession of the jail and other county property, and took upon himself the airs of his former office. Gen. Beaumont, of course declined to accede to the modest request.

A daily newspaper contends that Gen. Bennett was wrong, and that the government must give up the control of the rebel states, as a matter of necessity, in six weeks or a little longer. Our idea is about all the South has been fighting for, and it only remains to inquire for what we have spent 300,000,000 and 500,000,000 of treasure? Is it simply to send back the same crew to Congress which precipitated the rebellion a bevy-garden, with an accession to their strength of all the consequences of the extension of the basis of representation, incident on freeing the slaves? How long before, coalescing with northern demagogues, these men will relinquish a new rebellion, and, profiting by past experience, make it successful? How long? This is a pregnant question for those whose sons and brothers crowd the cemeteries around Andersonville and Richmond.

IT is not through ignorance that the European, but more particularly the English press, draw most of their libellous paragraphs against republican institutions from the facts concerning their working in some of our larger cities, but notably in New York. It is undeniably true that New York is the worst governed city in America, and that every department of its municipal organization is corrupt, and in the closest alliance with the disreputable while outside its walls. But this corruption is not openly violated as in Europe, for impunity when plunder as are men who could never have obtained position except through the aid of the lowest class of voters which this Europe has cast on our shores. They never could rise and riot in their profligacy, through the instrumentality of native voters, with which Europe has cast on our shores. They never could rise and riot in their profligacy, through the paragraphs of America and when European publicists virtuously denounce them, they affect to forget the source whence these men got their power. But the fact ever to be emigrated to the point of general and political education equal to the average American, the world would have no reason to deduce from the working of popular Government in the city of New York an argument, specious but fallacious, against popular institutions. Happily for the national name and character, the rabble and the criminal classes of New York city and its vicinity are not the fruit of "American" institutions, or the product of "American" soil. By the official state report of criminal statistics of 1864, we find that of 36,962 cases tried in the courts of special sessions of New York, Brooklyn and Jersey City, the native principles in the State, 26,953 were foreigners. Of 37,082 arrests by the metropolitan police force in the cities of New York and Brooklyn (they in reality forming one city) in that year, 25,486 were foreigners. And it must be remembered that even of this small proportionate number of these criminal and disorderly people who are not rated as foreigners, a very large majority are boys of from 15 to 20, born here of Irish and German parentage, and brought up in the Irish or German quarters of the city, which are almost as much Ireland and Germany as Belfast and Hamburg are. This we know in a general way, but it is shown by the last published report of the Howard Mission, an institution for the care and reformation of vagrant children, those who in two or three years form a part of the dangerous classes. In 1863 that institution received 605 children, of whom 24 are born in this country! Of the remaining 581, 195 were Irish and 234 German. To form any correct judgment of the working of our institutions, we should go outside of the cities, which are always corrupt, and study our political system in the country at large —in the villages and among the farms. It will be found that there, all the details of government are carried out with equal honesty and economy, and that the great end of all Government, the security, prosperity and happiness of the governed, is perfectly achieved.

FOR some motive, it is impossible to conceive what one, the contractors for the great Atlantic telegraph cable, rigorously refused to permit reporters aboard the Great Eastern. Perhaps they were instructed to tell their own story only. If the latest intelligence from the cable be true, it will be a sorry one—in their own way. We had hoped that the days of such mercenary subterfuge were past. It seems, however, the design of the contractors, whatever it was, some very worthy being frustrated by an "able reporter who went on board as an assistant electrician. It is said he was not merely the special correspondent of a daily London paper, but had engaged to supply two weekly journals, the one with pictorial and the other with descriptive sketches. The startling news was telegraphed by the secretary of the company to Mr. Glass, who sent on a letter to the reporter packing him off that the correspondent should be sent back. These were carried out with such promptitude that there was no chance for packing, and despite argument and expostulation, this luckless writer was put on board one of the last boats leaving the ship, while he had a large portion of his kit on board. Altogether the business was a very small one on the part of the contractors, who have not even had the tact to steal from many pens and pencils on board the steamer, as they will soon have reason to know.

GEN. SANTANNA is as trenchant with pen as sword. Writing to Col. Hillyer, from Mexico, in favor of the Liberal cause in Mexico, lately held in New York, he said:

"Mexico will be a hot ground for a second such a fire as this Mexican matter. We should give a permanent Government to Mexico, or the United States Government will not be done until the lake is done. The advent of the Monroe doctrine to a portion of the globe to all should belong by its history. Most of this Mexican question will be settled when we can say that the United States the moment we crossed the Rio Grande. The Democratic principles governed by justice and right."

A report reaches us from Canada to the effect that Gen. Grant expressed himself there in favor of the Mexican question. The Quebec Dispatch says:

"Gen. Grant stated that 100,000 men had been stationed on the Rio Grande as an army of observation, and that the French would have to leave Mexico, possibly if they chose, but decidedly if they refuse. The entire of Mexico he looked upon as one which had been conquered by the United States, and he expected would readily not be overcome until Maximilian were compelled to leave. He also stated that Napoleon had given up his own cruel ambition through interference. With regard to the relations between the United States and England, he did not think the present friendly state would be disturbed, and that the opinion was formed by reason of his hands having herself up with the French in the Mexican affair."

THE Albany Argus publishes an extract from an old letter of Mr. Judge Advocate Holt, deprecating the approaching civil war in the following prophetic words:

"I don't know nothing of civil war. This march in search of the pilgrimage of nations has hopped over the ocean to this country. Every five years or so it has been coming. Every five years I have said to a country that darkens every fourth and brings every heart with anguish."

TOWN GOSSIP.

THE Coroners Jury empanelled to investigate the Farmar street disaster has consulted its labors, and the public generally put questions which would tax the mark—hence more truth was elicited than certain witnesses intended to communicate. The testimony of Mr. Farmar threw the whole upon the two builders, whom a Brooklyn or Williamsburg paper—we are not sure which, for all the papers are so much alike, that when they are apart, even a Jew-pusan, who met to a companion, could not accurately conclude to which he was most intelligent of beings—even a Jew-pusan, we repeat, cannot tell which from which. But to return to what we were saying, the verdict of the jury blamed the only two sensible men connected with the building. We hope the coroners will be made to suffer the penalty of their carelessness.

THE Police force from each quarter is undergoing, to the cost during and scholastic discipline of Capt. Manning, of the steamer Glasgow, which not only carries the police on excursions, but on Harbor Inspection. But as we illustrate the loss of this ship in another column, we will not dwell on our readers to tell us we say them.

THE speculative community is beginning to look green over the numerous dedications in public companies. Absconding bank tellers, and gallant school-supervisors, are indulging in gallantries, unprecedented, and forever large sums of money of their confiding friends, are being squandered in a manner, and by an all-accepting confidence. As long as it is considered not disgraceful to swindle the Government, and seduce the soldiers in consequence, there is little harm made for credit, etc., or to excite pay for cleaning streets which are never swept, such private violations of trust will go on. The still greater outrage is, that these great criminals are never punished, while the woman who steals a loaf is sent to Blackwell's Island. Verily, in this respect, the course of justice does not run smooth in a republic.

ALL the Theatres, the same bills as last week have been generally speaking, patronized—only country people, and a few who cannot live without that noisy excitement, however, venture now within the charmed circle of the drama.

MR. CONWAY promises a vigorous campaign at the Park

Theatre, Brooklyn, next month. She has engaged Davidge, and several other popular artistes, and it is said that John Brougham will perform there for a week in October.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—A Washington paper states that the court-martial, of which Brig.-Gen. Underwood is President, and Col. N. P. Chipman, Judge Advocate, is still in receipt of a large number of letters from soldiers and others who have suffered and witnessed the sufferings inflicted on Union soldiers under the rebel Capt. Wirtz, at Andersonville. These letters are all read, and to the most intelligent a list of questions is mailed, with the request that answers be given thereto and returned. Should it then be deemed necessary to subpœna the volunteer, a subpœna is made out.

—— On Sunday evening last, in the midst of a discourse in Rev. Mr. Warner's church, on Ohio street, Cleveland, one of the stays of the chandelier, which is supported in the central part of the house, broke, and thereby upset the several coal oil lamps of which it is composed. The lamps broke in falling, the oil ignited, and several pews began blazing instantly. Three or four ladies were covered with the burning oil, and the flames leaping over their clothing were with great difficulty extinguished.

—— Henry B. Jenkins, paying teller at Phœnix Bank, of Wall street, was arrested on the 10th of August, for embezzling $250,000 of the bank, with which he had been connected 20 years. There are five others implicated with him.

—— The old rebel general, Frank Cheatham, visited Gov. Brownlow a few days since to obtain his endorsement to an application for pardon.

—— Mosby, the guerrilla leader, has been arrested at Alexandria, Va.

—— Herschel Johnson, candidate for vice-presidency on the Douglas ticket for 1860, has been pardoned by the President.

—— R. F. Farrell, Ohio, has been appointed Consul at Cadiz, and Gen. Cesnola, Consul at Cyprus.

—— The heavy rains in Wisconsin and Minnesota have damaged the crops in those States.

—— It is significant that our most popular generals should lately have so emphatically endorsed the Monroe Doctrine.

—— The receipts from customs for July amounted to 10,000,000, and those for August to as much more. Five-eighths of the revenue is now collected in New York.

—— A man named Early who was arrested as an accomplice in the Phœnix Bank defalcations, committed suicide in the cell of the police station on the morning of the 11th inst., by cutting his throat with a penknife, which he had concealed in his mouth while the officers were searching him before locking him up. He confessed to having received over $100,000 from Jenkins. It appears that the defalcations of Jenkins, the second teller of the Phœnix Bank, will amount to over $300,000; over $30,000 was given by him by to one of those pests of society, the pretty waiter girls.

—— A terrible steamboat disaster occurred on Lake Huron about six miles from shore on Wednesday evening, the 9th inst. The steamboats Pewabic and Meteor struck each other, while running at full speed, with such force as to crush in the entire bow of the former, causing her to sink in four or five minutes, and carrying down about 100 passengers. It was scarcely dark when the accident occurred, and the boats saw each other when six miles apart. When approaching they exchanged the usual signals, and the Pewabic bore off to let the Meteor pass; but for some unaccountable reason this boat turned in the same direction and struck the Pewabic in the manner stated. A number of passengers on the Pewabic were killed by the crushing in of her timbers. There were from 150 to 200 passengers on the Pewabic, only 75 of whom were saved.

—— The railroad train from Muscatine, Iowa, to Washington, in that State, met with a disaster on the 10th inst at Ainsworth, by going through a bridge. One of the passenger cars was precipitated into a chasm. Four persons were killed and several passengers were wounded.

—— The steamer Arrow exploded on the 5th inst. in the North River, by which several lives were lost.

—— The State Department has received news from our Consul in Malta, that the Asiatic cholera is raging there with great violence.

—— A mine of solid petroleum has been discovered in Western Virginia. The vein varies in depth from 50 inches to 250 feet. A ton of the ore yields 170 gallons of pure oil.

—— The coat which Col. Ulric Dahlgren wore when he was shot, was found recently in a farmer's house near Richmond.

—— The New York Times says that swill milk is once more on the increase.

—— On inquiry at the United States Treasurer's Office, it has been ascertained that of the large amount of notes presented to redemption, not more than from one and a half to two per cent., if so many, are counterfeit. The spurious notes are easily detected and promptly branded "counterfeit" with an iron constantly kept heated for that purpose. Of course, the holders and not the Treasury bear the loss. From $90 to $100 of such currency of various denominations is destroyed every day. No knowledge of counterfeit national bank notes has come to the bureau, or of ones or twos of the United States currency. The latter denominations, however, are altered to represent higher amounts, and some photograph fives are in circulation. A tolerably well executed $50 note recently found its way to the redemption bureau, having previously been stamped as counterfeit by an Eastern bank. The most numerous counterfeits are on the fractional currency.

—— An African king lately sent an application to President Lincoln for a waterproof coat, which has been sent to him. He signs himself King of Barcos.

—— An old negress, at Greenwich, Conn., lately shot a rowdy who wanted to break into her house, with a number of other ruffians, for the purpose of tarring and feathering her son, whose sole offence was that he had married a white woman some two years since. The jury very properly brought in a verdict of justifiable homicide.

—— Whole number of pensions granted up to July 1 For widows and minor children, 100,000; for invalids 75,000.

—— The population of Syracuse is 31,323; an increase of 3,204 since 1860.

—— A negro woman who was baptized a few Sunday ago at Huntsville, Ala., came forth from the water shouting: "Freed from slavery, freed from sin, bless God and Gen. Grant."

—— A late captain in the army has opened a school in Chicago for the purpose of instructing gentlemen in the use of the common walking cane as a means of attack and defence by scientific rules, something like those which apply to fencing.

—— The Mayor of Raleigh, N. C., has refused permission to establish colored schools there, and Gen. Schofield has granted it. The blacks will have their schools.

—— A hundred men are at work clearing away for the foundation of the United States Hotel at Saratoga, and the architects are busily engaged upon the plans for the building. The work is to be vigorously pushed.

—— The amount of water drunk at the Congress spring, Saratoga, during the height of the season, is greater than many people suppose. A count was kept one morning last week, when it appeared that four boys dipped at the rate of fifty glasses a minute, or 3,000 glasses per hour. The amount drunk that morning, in three hours, was about nine thousand glasses.

—— Michael Cummings, the man who fired the first gun in defence of the American flag in the late rebellion, died in New York on Tuesday. At the beginning of the rebellion deceased entered the service of the Government, and was stationed at Fort Sumter. He had letters from General Anderson, from which it appeared that he fired the first gun at the rebels at the attack on Fort Sumter, and also fired the last shot previous to the surrender of the fort.

—— Mr. Greeley is not only to remain on the Tribune, but the stockholders have voted to raise his salary from $5,000 to $7,000.

—— A Yankee in Kansas sells liquor in a gun-barrel instead of a glass, to evade the law and make it appear beyond dispute that he is selling by the barrel.

—— Ex-Senator Nicholson, of Columbia, Tenn., formerly Andrew Johnson's colleague in the United States Senate, recently declared that, "to repel a freeman from the ballot-box simply because he was once a slave or because his skin was black, would be to follow a blind prejudice;" and that negroes "who possess reasonable qualifications should be admitted to the ballot-box."

—— We have ascertained, from official sources, that on the 1st day of last May there were 1,050,000 men enrolled in the army and on the pay-rolls. Since that date there have been discharged a little over 700,000, leaving, in round numbers, about 330,000 still in the army and on the pay-rolls.

—— Lydia Maria Child is severe on the hair waterfall. She calls that female adornment "an unbecoming headgear," which looks like a cabbage in a net, tricked out with beads and wampum. "Hoops" she calls "hencoops," in which case we suppose the women in them are chickens.

Foreign.—Dr. Pritchard, the poisoner of his wife and his wife's mother, was hanged at Glasgow, in the presence of 100,000 spectators.

—— Constance Kent, who confessed to murdering her half-brother five years ago, has had her sentence of death commuted to transportation for life.

—— Queen Emma, of Hawaii, whose portrait we published in our last paper, is now one of the lions of London. She is the guest of Lady Franklin; but had not, up to the last accounts, had yet had an interview with her sister of England.

—— We notice in the bills of mortality for 1863, that there were 21 executions, 399 homicides, 1,819 suicides, and 2,766 persons burnt to death.

—— Besides the method rendering gunpowder inexplosive, invented by Mr. Gale, we have two new explosives. One is a very strong gunpowder, which is made up of two portions like a seidlitz powder, each inexplosive by itself, to be mixed together before loading the rifle. It has been tried at our nearest shooting grounds, it is said with good success. The other is a mixture for blasting, a liquid composed of one part of glycerine and three parts of nitric acid. This is poured into a very small hole in a rock, and some water—the only tamping required—is poured on top. A fuse, passing through the water, explodes the mixture with a force so much greater than gunpowder as to very much reduce the cost of such operations.

—— The riots indulged in by the English at the late election, have been used by the French liberal press with great effect, as conclusive evidence against a popular form of government. It is stated by candid observers, that so much rioting on similar occasions had never been remembered.

CHRISTINE NORTH.

BY LUCY VELONA.

THE sun had gone quite down, and the sea breezes came in landward, cold and dark.

Christine North pulled her Shetland mantle close about her shoulders, and walked rapidly over the shingles, towards the Newsteed house. Some one touched her shoulder; she turned abruptly, and was face to face with Chester Sutherland.

"Chester!"

"Where are you running to, wonder! I saw you down upon the beach half a mile back, and have been trying to catch you ever since."

"I thought you were going to Lake George this summer?"

"And so you came here to avoid me?"

"Of course I did."

"Thank you!"

He drew her arm into his own and turned back towards the sea.

"I must go home. Aunt Houghton will be worried about me," she said, stopping, and trying to unloose her arm.

"She knows I am with you," he answered, still holding her fast.

"But it is too chilly."

"Here is your water-proof, then."

She looked at him wonderingly, as he took it off his arm and fastened it about her neck.

"Have you any more objections?"

"Yes." Her voice was decided and firm. "There is no use in commencing this again. I cannot go with you."

"You will, to-night."

"Gentlemanly, very." Her voice was sarcastic and cutting.

He replied in the same tone.

"Thank you, my Lady North; but spare the rest of your cruel words, for you might repent them when you heard that I was killed in Dixie."

"What?"

She walked quietly enough beside him now.

"I am going to the war. Have enlisted in the 26th."

"Chester! And I did not know it until now."

All the color had gone from her face, leaving it white as marble.

He smiled, and said:

"What difference does it make with you? Just now you refused even to walk with me."

"I wish I was dead!" she burst out, and snatching her arm from his, she sped swiftly back the way they had come, and left him standing alone.

He did not try to follow or stop her; he only stood and looked after her until she disappeared up the steps of her boarding-house.

There was no danger but he could see her again, now.

It was the old story of love and pride. Christine North was poor and independent; she taught music and French in preference to living on her rich relatives. Her aunt, Mrs. Houghton, insisted upon taking her with her every season to some of the numerous watering places. This was all the recreation she allowed herself.

Chester Sutherland was a gentleman of leisure; and they were unfortunate enough to love each other. She had refused him, positively, but he had not given up at one refusal, and did not intend to.

He looked in at the soiree that evening, but Christine was not there; so he sent a note saying he was waiting to walk with her upon the balcony.

She came directly, and they went out.

The moonlight shone through the trees in patches upon them, and from below the gay voices and music came floating up upon the evening air. There was no one else out. They were alone.

"Are you in earnest about going to the war?" Christine asked.

"Never was more so in my life. Am I to hear from you?"

"No. What could I write."

"A great deal, if you would. You might say a word here to-night, that would make me go off much happier than I shall now."

"I cannot say anything that will make you happier."

"Well, no matter, then, how soon a rebel bullet finds me."

"Chester Sutherland, don't you dare to say such words to me again! You have not a grain of pity."

She spoke sharply as one speaks in pain.

"But I have more than you, Christine," he said quietly. "Just because I happen to have a little money, and you not quite as much, you absolutely refuse to marry me; and yet you say you love me. Such love! I hear that a Mr. Stoneman, of Lee, is paying you attentions. Is it true?"

She did not reply.

"Is it true?" he repeated.

"I have promised to be his wife."

"Good God!" He clenched her wrist tightly, and stood before her, his eyes looking into hers. "That is a lie!"

"Oh! Chester, Chester! It is the truth."

Her head fell upon his arm, and she was sobbing violently. His other arm closed about her, and he stood still as death, for, perhaps, five minutes. Then he lifted up her head, saying as men say when all hope is gone:

"Then, Christine, this is, indeed, our last meeting. I cannot wish you either happiness or misery."

He kissed her lips solemnly, and led her to her own door. There they parted.

The next day Chester Sutherland left the seashore for the seat of war.

November came with its black, chilly air. Christine North was spending her last year in school teaching. She had promised Ralph Stoneman to be his wife before the next autumn leaves should fall, and of course, such promises have to be kept. He was a quiet farmer, who lived in her native town, and one she might have loved had her way never been crossed by Chester Sutherland. But she was a woman of spirit and will; and her reason told her that she had chosen well, in answering yes to Ralph Stoneman's proposals for her hand. What answer her heart made, it was not well to think.

It had been three months since Chester Sutherland joined the army. Ralph had never heard his name, she thought, and likely never would—certainly not from her lips.

"Where was he now?" Christine looked out of the window upon the lowering sky, this dreary November day, and answered the question to herself. "Dead, perhaps!" No one would tell me if he were. Sometime she might stumble over the news in the paper. She saw the postboy coming up the walk, and she went down immediately to meet him. There was a letter for her from the army, in Ralph Stoneman's handwriting. She tore it open quickly, and read:

"CHRISTINE—I came on here with the Sanitary Commission on the 17th, therefore, have been here a week. There is a colonel here by the name of Chester Sutherland, belonging to the 26th regiment, who is dangerously wounded, and cannot probably live many days. He is delirious, and constantly calls for one Christine North—is it you?

"RALPH STONEMAN."

Christine's face went ghastly for a moment, then the blood surged back. Chester dying! She crushed the letter in her hand and flew up-stairs again. She must be ready for the next train, if the whole world knew her mission.

Two days afterwards, a woman with a wild, anxious face, stood before Ralph Stoneman in the hospital. It was Christine North. On all sides there were sick and wounded men; some dying, some dead; here an agonized mother bending over her child, there a wife catching the last word from an expiring husband. The sight half froze Christine's blood, and she did not hear Ralph Stoneman's question, "How did you come here?" until he had repeated it.

"To see him," she answered, in a whisper.

"Who?"

"Colonel Sutherland."

"Then you do know him? I feared it. He lies yonder."

Christine looked the way he pointed.

"Not dead, Ralph?"

"Is he so much to you then?" he said bitterly, looking at her colorless face. "He is not dead, but he knows nothing. You do not, of course, wish me there with you?"

His face darkened as he moved away, and Christine glided up to the bedside. There he lay, the hot fever coursing wildly through his veins, his hair thrown back, and his large hollow eyes, like a madman's, as they were.

"Death to the traitors! Now boys, on!" he said, as Christine stood beside him.

She passed her hand gently back and forth over his forehead. He noticed her then for the first.

"Bend down low," he said, in that mysterious tone which delirious persons sometimes assume. "I want to tell you of Christine—Christine North. You knew her, don't you? I dreamed she was going to be married. Ha! ha! what a cursed lie that was! Stand up to the charge, boys! Now we have them!"

"I am expecting her every day," he said, joyfully, going on again. "She would never let me lie here on these stones. Why, they are killing me! No, Christine wouldn't do that. She loves me, you know."

"She is here now, Chester. Don't you know me?"

"Here! of course. Where else?" he said, dreamily, and then sank into a narcotic sleep.

For a week Christine listened to his wild raving, with scarcely a hope of his returning reason. Ralph Stoneman did all in his power for them both, though he steadily avoided Christine, save when duty brought them together. The eighth day there came a change. Christine thought it the precursor of death, and hastily summoned the surgeon. Ralph came too. He was strong and she weak. If Colonel Sutherland died, she might need him to lean on yet. The sick man lay in a stupor, unconscious of all.

"Speak to him," the surgeon said; "he will be sane if he arouses at all."

Christine bent down and said, almost in a whisper, "Chester!"

He moaned a little, nothing more.

"Christine! Christine North is here to see you," she said again.

Another moan, that was all.

The surgeon forced some cordial through his lips, and they waited.

After a little while he motioned to her to speak to him again, and they stood back.

"Chester!" she said.

His breath seemed going. Would he never wake! In an agony of fear she stooped over and took his head upon her arm.

"Chester! Chester! for the love of heaven do not die without some sign, one word, that you know me."

Her face was as white as the one she bent above.

"Speak to me! To Christine!" she said, wildly.

Slowly his eyes opened, and he looked round upon them. Christine first—then the rest. The surgeon stepped up to his side.

"You are better, colonel," he said, in a cheery tone.

He smiled feebly, looking at Christine, moved his head a little closer to her, and then fell asleep again.

"He is safe now," the surgeon said, and went away.

Ralph did not move until he had gone. Then he stepped up beside Christine.

"I go in the morning, Christine. Is there anything I can do for you or yours, before I go?"—the yours with emphasis.

"I dare not ask your pardon, Ralph, I have been so wicked. But I did not think it would come to this. Indeed, I did not."

"It is a hard blow!" he said, chokingly.

"And you were always so good to me. God will never forgive me, if you do."

"If trouble ever comes, I will never fail you. Good-bye."

He wrung her hand and was gone.

In a month more Colonel Sutherland and Christine came North. Both were cured—he of his wounds, and she of her pride.

GRAND BALL AT SARATOGA.—The event of the day—and, indeed of the season, is the grand ball at the Union Hotel, Saratoga, given by the Messrs. Lelande on Friday evening, the 11th inst. The throng was immense, the music delightful, and the display of toilets more rich and more elegant than at any previous ball of the present season. The great dining-room and the magnificent parlors of the ne plus ultra of hotels were literally packed with gorgeous ttires. Major-Gen. Frank P. Blair and Major-Gen. B. F. Butler were among the distinguished gentlemen present. Everything passed off satisfactorily, and the ball closed at a late hour.

WE are happy to learn that the recent fire at 650 Broadway, which for a time threatened to destroy the entire block, has only partially damaged one building, the store of Bauer & Co., agents for the sale of Knabe's famous pianos. In a few days the premises will be perfectly repaired, and the business proceed as usual.

DELAMERE'S European pocket time keeper is one of the neatest and most ingenious time-keepers we have seen; here for $1 every man can carry with him a machine to ascertain the exact hour to a minute—without going so far as the English Chronicle, which says it will supersede all other methods, it is certainly the cheapest and most useful thing we have seen for its purpose.

A HINT TO CLERGYMEN.—Sir Roger de Coverly requested a particular friend of his at the University, to find him out a clergyman rather of plain sense than much learning, of good aspect, a clear voice and sociable temper. "My friend," says Sir Roger, "found me out this gentleman, who, besides the endowments required of him, is a good scholar, though he does not show it. I have given him the parsonage of the parish; and because I know his value, have settled upon him a good annuity for life. He has now been with me thirty years. At his first settling with me, I made him a present of all the good sermons which have been printed in English, and only begged of him that every Sunday he would pronounce one of them in the pulpit. Accordingly he has digested them into such a series that they follow one another naturally, and make a continued system of practical divinity."

Sir Roger goes on to say, "I could heartily wish that more of our country clergy would follow this example, and instead of wasting their spirits on laborious compositions of their own, would endeavor after a handsome elocution, and all those other talents that are proper to enforce what has been penned by greater masters. This would be not only more easy to themselves, but more edifying to the people."

RUINS OF THE REBELLION.—A Virginia paper speaks of the startling fatality which has overtaken those who were the political rebellious leaders of that State. At the beginning of secession Virginia had one Cabinet Minister who was a secessionist, the Secretary of War, John B. Floyd. He is dead. She had two foreign Ministers who were secessionists, Hon. R. K. Meade and John M. Daniel. Both are dead. Her two Senators, Hunter and Mason, were secessionists—one is a prisoner, the other an exile. Her oldest and most persistent, and among her most influential citizens who supported secession, and the man who fired the first gun at Sumter, was Edmund Ruffin. He is dead. The recognized leaders of the secessions in the State Convention, were George W. Randolph and Ex-President Tyler. Randolph is dying abroad, Tyler is dead. She had three newspapers conspicuously devoted to secession, Richmond Inquirer, the Richmond Examiner, and the Norfolk Argus. The journals are all extinct, and the leading spirits of all—Wise, Daniel and Lamb—are dead. In brief, we are told, there "are not now ten men of conspicuous prominence in the secession movement of January, 1861, who remain to exercise—if they possess the desire—their influence to thwart the movement of the people towards loyalty and reunion."

BASE BALL MATCH FOR THE CHAMPIONSHIP BETWEEN THE ATLANTIC CLUB OF BROOKLYN AND THE MUTUAL CLUB OF NEW YORK, AT HOBOKEN, AUGUST 3.—THE MUTUALS "CATCHING OUT THE ATLANTICS ON A "FOUL BALL."

BASE-BALL MATCH FOR THE CHAMPIONSHIP.

THE Elysian Fields, at Hoboken, N. J., were crowded on the 3d inst., to witness the grand contest for the Championship of the United States, between the Mutual Club of New York and the Atlantic Club of Brooklyn. Never before was there such a vast assemblage of people gathered together on any similar occasion, and never has there been known in the annals of our national sports, such a closely contested game of base-ball, as that which took place on Thursday.

At a quarter to 3 P. M., all being in readiness for the match and the field clear—as well as it was possible to clear it—the contest commenced, the Atlantics being the first to go to the bat.

After some splendid play, which lasted one hour and a half, a heavy rainstorm put a stop to the sport. Five innings having been played according to the rules of the National Association, the game was decided in favor of the Atlantics. The score stood at the close—Atlantics, 13; Mutuals, 12.

THE NEW STEAM FIRE-ENGINE METROPOLITAN NO. 1, THE FIRST ENGINE DRAWN BY HORSES IN NEW YORK CITY.

THE COLLEGE REGATTA.

On Thursday and Friday, the 27th and 28th ult., the great event of the collegiate season took place at Worcester, Mass., on Lake Quinsigamond, one of the most beautiful little pieces of water in New England. The contest was between the trained boats' crews, six in number each, of Harvard and Yale Colleges. The meeting was as much a mere question of rivalry among the athletes of those venerable institutions; although every college in the country might be considered interested in the physical training of the rowers. The boats, or "shells" as they are technically called, were of a light walnut color, with seats just wide enough to accommodate one man. The rudders were attached by wire, running almost the whole length of the boats, which were steered by means of a spring lever at the feet of the bow oarsman. When the hour for the race, 4.40, Friday afternoon, had arrived, the scene at the water's edge was quite as gay as at any of the races on the Cam. The start was given by word, and as the boats sped on for the mastery, the cheering was vociferous. It was evident, however, from the start that the Yale crew would prove the victors, as they did—leaving the Harvard men about four boats length behind, and winning the race in seventeen minutes forty-two and one-half seconds.

NIGHT AND MORNING:

A War Waif.

BY C. D. GARDETTE.

ALL day, along the misty flanks
Of bristling hills, the battle rung,
Till moonless night, athwart the ranks,
Her cloud-furred mantle darkly flung.

Forgotten, on a spur of hill,
Two sorely-smitten soldiers lay,
And one moaned, "Water! water!" still,
And one "O, God! that it were day!"

Know you the bitterness of death
When, in the hour of hope's eclipse,
The quick siroccos of the breath
Rush through the crisp and parched lips?

"Water!" still "water!" moaned the wretch.
The other heard him, and forbore,
Even as his lips were on the stretch
To meet the flask, half drained before.

Know you the awful thirst of life
When, trembling on its hither span,
Bursts, in the soul, a deadly strife
Between the Moloch and the man?

The other heard his comrade's cry
And clenched his hand, and breathed awhile.
And then, an angel, passing by,
Caught through the night a glittering smile.

And then, "Your hand, my brother. Drink!
Drink deep, that one may live!" he said:
"My thread is fully spun, I think:
Good night! God help you!" and was dead.

The soldier drank, 'tis Nature's law—
Drank all, nor recked the other died;
Turned his white face, at morn, and saw
An ebon visage at his side!

The Last of his Line.

CHAPTER I.

"TAPPY!"

"Here, sir."

"Do you know where the stone farm-house is at the cross-roads beyond the church?"

"Do I know where it is? ha! ha! ha! upon me sowl, it wud be a bright lad, lieutenant, that wudn't know where it is, sure, whin ye've jist towld him. Indade, sir, an' it's the stun farm-house at the cross-roads t'other side the owld church ye're a meaning?"

"Get out, Paddy, you blackguard! Give me none of your impudence. I want to know if you know who lives there?"

"Do I know who lives there, is it? Sure, an well enough I knows who lives there. Ain't it owld haythen in the State of owld Virginy? Sure, know owld Pringle!"

"Very well, sir, I've an errand for you at 'owld Pringle's:' if you do it right, here's a gold dollar for you; if you do it wrong, here's a pair of thick soled boots, and a man that knows how to use them."

"All right, all right, sir—all right!"

INTERVIEW BETWEEN QUACKERADY AND LUCRETIA.

TOWSER'S ATTACK ON TAPPY.

"Here's a package—never mind prying into it. You're to take this package to the stone farm-house."

"What's in there?"

"That, sir, is no part of your business. Do you understand now? If you break the wrapper I shall surely find it out, and then you will just as surely come within an ace of having every bone in your ugly little body broken."

"All right, sir, all right—all right!"

"You must wait until it's dark enough to dodge around the picket, and then make the best of your way to the stone house—"

"An' give it to owld Pringle! all right, all right, sir, I'll am the goold dollar, and fetch back one o' Pringle's best turkeys, to boot."

"If you do, you'll catch my boot, you rascal. You've got nothing to do with old Pringle or his turkeys. You're to give this package to the young lady that's living there."

"Hooray! hooray! 'Sing too-ral, la-loo-ral, la-loo-ral, la-ley.' And what shall I say to the young miss? Give her this little bundle and say: 'Lieutenant Duncan sinds his compliments and hopes ye're well after your adventure of yesterday?'"

"That's it, Tappy! you've hit it the first time. I want you to mind your eye, though, and not let any of the old folks see you, and don't give the package to anybody but the young lady herself. Be off, now, and make your report to these headquarters any time between now and to-morrow morning."

The onc Irish drummer-boy retired to the security of a neighboring thicket, and proceeded to

Pringle, the precious owld rebel—the man who's got the nicest pigs and turkeys in the whole coontury? Ain't it owld Pringle, the dirthy owld sinner, who's been makin' his boast as to how he'd shoot the first Yankee soldier that come on his premises—an' who's got the finest plantation and the prettiest gall, the biggest dog, the fastest hosses and the maneet disposition of any cecesh court a visitation of the terrible ossseous punishment threatened by his superior, by prying into the package entrusted to his care, muttering to himself:

"He's rekonnoy, he golly, to break me bones if he finds me out."

His mischievous curiosity revealed a neat bequest of flowers, encircled by a fine gold bracelet with a broken clasp upon which was engraved the name "Lucretia McRae."

"Bedad, that's that girl, sure! and this 'ere's her handcuff," soliloquised the young imp. "I guess it got broke yesterday, an' he's found it. He's a nice chap, so he is!"

Chuckling over his discovery, Tappy replaced the articles, tied up the package again as it was before, and having now become quite enough for his purpose, he started on his errand; the house designated being distant from camp about a mile and a half.

Arrived in the neighborhood, his further progress was arrested by the savage growling of a dog at the front gate, and so, when a hundred yards away from the house, he paused to reconnoitre. This animal was enough upon that portion of the enemy's works impracticable, he concluded to try an attack in the rear; so, marching by the right flank, over a high board fence and the snout of a pig-sty, he brought up in the top of a huge cherry tree, directly over the back porch of the mansion.

But the weary sentinel at the front gate was not to be thus circled. He was had already had some little experience with blue uniforms, and, to his canine instinct, the movements of the suspicious-looking stranger evinced entirely too much of the depredations on the hen-roost and in the dairy, the guarding of which was his peculiar province. So, perceiving that his enemy had changed his base, he instantly changed his, and yelling with all his might, proceeded to put into execution such a series of vigorous flank and salient movements as to decidedly harrass the rear of the retreating foe and create a bit of by-play between the drummer-boy, active as he was, and such rabbit himself scenes in his new position.

The shouts of the dog brought the men to the door—one of them Pringle himself, a genuine specimen of the F. F. V. tribe of Virginia planters, portly, pompous, and fifty—the other, the Hippocrates Quackbody, a sleek, oily, insinuating M. D., of twenty-eight, with ambitious designs upon Pringle's niece and Pringle's farms.

"Gate! no! not that dog, he's always after the cats! Get out, you, you dog! Here, come here, sir! Jim, take this fellow away."

"He's a very ferocious animal, Mr. Pringle; you don't allow him up nights, I see," said Dr. Quackrody, glancing nervously at his legs.

Mr. Pringle, appreciating the uneasiness of his guest, at the prospect of being mauled by a ferocious bulldog, on his retreat from the house, ordered the colored boy, Jim, to shut the animal up in the stable; further orders adding as an apology for allowing him to run at large, at night, that he was in great dread of the depredations of the Yankee soldiers, great numbers of whom were constantly prowling about.

"Up-town here, Pringle, I understand that your lovely niece had something of an adventure, yesterday."

"Oh, yes—a narrow escape! I was terribly upset about it for a while. I haven't had such a shock since the freshet came twenty-one years ago, and took away my house and my children, like a thief in the night, leaving me childless—the last of my line!"

That was a dreadful visitation, truly," replied the doctor, sympathetically, "but a benign Providence has placed an angel in your household to supply, in a measure, the places of the lost ones," in his blandest tones.

"Ah, yes. Child is a good girl—a little wild—something of a romp, but still she is beautiful, accomplished, loving—almost a daughter, in fact, to me; she will be wealthy, for she will be my heir. But, about what all this is but a poor solace. The thought that some one of my race—of that hateful my cursed cent, is this: she can never perpetuate the name of Pringle! The illustrious lineage of which I am so proud will die out with me! Cousin's maiden name of Pringle, which was one of the very first names in Virginia—for I trace my ancestors back to the settlement of James-town—that name must also end with me. It is this that embitters my whole existence and makes me the most miserable wretch on the earth. What avails wealth, when in a few brief years, at best, that wealth must be enjoyed by one of another name? what avails social position, when you know that in a very few years your very name will be entirely gone in the descendants of my past? These estates, I tell you, Dr. Quackrody, these in the State, though they are—so far from being a source of pleasure to me—are a perfect sting. For have they not been in the Pringle family for upwards of a century, and am I not the last of my line?"

"My dear Mr. Pringle, I appreciate your distress fully, and let me assure you that anything I can do to mitigate the very unpleasant nature of your situation shall be freely done, even though in minister to your family pride, I sacrifice something of the world's admiration of genius, something of that fame which is even now beginning to flash my pinions, something of my love of scientific pursuits—sacrifices which must ever be made, when one assumes the cares and responsibilities of the married state."

"I—don't—altogether understand you, doctor."

"What I mean to say, then, is, that it is a physiological fact that all old blouds—like yours—which is, in course of time, deteriorated, become restored to its primitive vigor and excellence by the infusion of a younger and more vigorous blood, provided the latter is equally noble in itself. Now, for instance, the name of Quackrody—although not so ancient a name as the name of Pringle, or even the name of McRae—although, in fact, if your humble servant, am the first Quackrody that I ever heard of; yet the Quackrody blood—though I say it myself—has given evidence of noble qualities, and is an undisputed fact that some of the Quackrodies are geniuses of a very lofty character. Of course it does not become me to be more explicit; I will merely say, however, that the 'Great American Antidote, Quackrody Specific, and Patent Cod Liver for throat and lung diseases—invented and patented by myself, more than two years ago—is attracting the favorable attention of the learned world."

"Ahem! no doubt! but—but, I—I don't understand you. If I didn't know you, Quackrody, I should think you was a Yankee pill-peddler."

"In plain terms, then, my dear Mr. Pringle, for I'm a plain man—you have a niece!"

"Yes, sir,—and a very pretty one, but what in the devil—if I may be allowed the expression—is that to you, sir?"

"Nothing, my will, undoubtedly, ere long, have a call—as the clergy say—to adopt the marriage state, Pringle, then, my dear sir, what I propose, is to do myself the distinguished honor of asking Miss Lucretia McRae to the bridal altar, and in a manner to do away with the illustrious name of McRae—the sole representative of the illustrious, but soon-to-be-extinct house of Pringle of Jamestown—by the introduction of the name of Quackrody—for the benefit of all parties concerned."

"Eh! eh! ah! ahem! an illustrious idea! I—I—understand; ahem! no doubt it would be very satisfactory, if—ahem—to both parties the arrangement was definitely decided upon; but in particular Quackrody referred to was ever possessed of a fortune."

"My dear Mr. Pringle, I shall take no offence at your remarks. I have made the proposition with a view to your happiness, and not to my own position in which you find yourself, at your time of life, and destitute of a direct heir. Though you may not be aware of the fact, from my unobtrusive manner of my motives at this time, yet the time is rapidly approaching when you will; and permit me to say in your behalf, that of my particular Quackrody, at the present epoch, is destitute of cash in vulgarly called a horse, but I possess a capital of a thousand dollars in hard personal appearance, backed by an unlimited quantity of brass—good evening, sir."

"Stop, stop, Quackrody! I—I—beg, about that rheumatism. I feel so much better to-night that I don't think I shall require your services; in fact, sir, when I need you again, I'll send for you."

"Ah, that Colorado Specific of mine will serve in a case of chronic hectic cases. Of course you'll give me a testimonial, my dear Mr. Pringle. I'll have it printed alongside of—"

"Yes, yes—yes! I'll give you anything—anything, sir; only, when I want you in my house again, I'll send for you. Good evening, sir."

"Good ni——. Oh, my dear Mr. Pringle—that infuriated animal—that dog, sir!"

"That dog! Oh, he's chained up in the barn—locked up, sir. It will be entirely safe for you to take your departure, sir," said Mr. Pringle, in his blandest tones and accompanying the remark with his fist down upon his knee at the conclusion of the sentence.

"Good-by, sir, thank you, my dear Mr. Prinkle. I shall long remember your kindness. Good-night!"

"Good-night! good-night, sir! good-night!"

"Oh, Mr. Pringle, one word; that testimonial—all round in the morning, sir!"

"No sir, no, no! I won't permit me to say emphatically—in fact sir—I will send it to you, unsolicited, good-night!" And moving towards the door, the irate host succeeded at length in getting rid of his unwelcome and loquacious visitant.

As soon as the doctor was fairly outside the gate, the old man called vociferously for his colored boy, Jim.

"Jim, here you black rascal! let that dog out of the barn, and betwixt, remember he's not to be kept chained one minute after seven o'clock, on anybody's account."

CHAPTER II.

MEANWHILE how fared it with Tappy, the drummer boy, in the top of the cherry tree? On looking out about in his unimagenous little sphere, he was not a little startled at discovering a closely muffled figure standing upon one of the upper branches of the opposite tree. This, however, soon proved that whatever his new neighbor might be, he was emphatically an anti-negro like himself, seeking to avoid discovery by any of the inmates of the house, so that, at the worst, they were even with each other in their knowledge of each other's presence; and relying upon his stock of native cleverness and hereditary good luck, Tappy resolved to entertain his acquaintance. He accordingly crawled up to within whispering distance—will pleased to observe the stranger shrink away from him as he advanced, and after some hesitating about the bush, at last succeeded in convincing him in the forks of a limb, when he could not retreat without imminent danger of breaking his neck.

"How air ye, capt'n?" asked Tappy, growing bold in proportion to the visible increase in the trepidation of the muffled stranger.

But the latter interrogation failing to elicit a response, Tappy tried it again.

"Fine warm evening isn't; dye live up here, stranger?"

No answer.

"Upon my word I don't think any more of yer sociability than I do of yer politeness; though for the matter o' that the house wud do well enough in a warm evenin' like this, if it never rained, but in a storm it wouldn't be the roof wud be mighty inclined to take."

No reply.

"Say, op'n, ain't that owld wooden cage yo've got over yer head mighty uncomfortable such a night as this?"

The only answer was an attempt to get further away from the merciless drummer boy, who, encouraged by this manifestation, seized the straw get by the shoulder, and drew away the cloak in which face was muffled.

"Ugh! faith that's an ugly mug o' yours. Dogolly! I don't much blame ye for wantin' to hide it," commented Tappy, examining as well as he could in the dim light the features of a man about forty-five years of age, with a long hawked nose, sharp, restless eyes, and cadaverous cheeks.

"Umph! by my sowl, judging from the shape o' that nose, and the roosting place ye've found out, ye must be a relation at laste to the hen's family."

"Don't—don't talk so loud, they'll hear you!" gasped the fellow, struggling feebly in Tappy's grasp.

"Heighol be golly the crather's got a tongue anyhow," soliloquized Tappy, tasting a more coarse hail upon him. "Say old Hawkey, what yer doing up here—eh? any eggs in a chicken, hey?"

"I—I come up here to get a few cherries—let me go!" whined his victim.

"Cherries, eh! Is there anything else ye're after besides a few cherries ye want to stale, ye old sinner? Come, out with it, or I'll throw you."

"I see you are a soldier. Now tell me what your business is, and I will tell you what mine is," said the stranger, ceasing his struggling efforts.

"By my sowl!" said Tappy, reflecting, "that sounds like a fair offer, and so we are about even as to secrets. Well, I'll do, capt'n, give me half a dollar to make sure ye're no arrest, an' its a bargain."

"I—I—I've not got it."

"If you do."

"And how can I show you?"

"Why hand it up! I kape it by me a thrick on me—do ye mind that, now?"

"I—I—I—I—have no money, I have no funds to-morrow morning as a spy in this very tree; please make a note of that."

"Oh, that's your business ye're a wantin' to know. All right, sir. I'm a drummer by profession—me business is to hammer music out o' single sticks. They looked quizzically at the skinny caput of his auditor, as though he imagined that that would not be a bad substitute. "Me business is to drum a chicken or two out o' owld Pringle's coop; we soldiers are fresh friends to the chickens—are you a soldier too?"

"But how does it come you're alone in your enterprise, boy? I've always been they go to steal chickens, don't usually go alone."

"Look-a here, owld Hawkey, ye're actin' altogether too curious intirely. Perhaps, be-jabers, I ain't so much alone as—as you're a thinkin' for, an' maybe ye'll find it out to yer sorrow afore long, me larlin. I'll tell you what I consider myself to be, and now I want you to tell me who you consider yourself to be, according to yer own bargain, turn about's fair play."

A moment the little black twinkling eye of the drummer boy peered into the face of the boy, seeming to read his character.

"Out wid yer story, old Hawkey, or out o' this tree you go! I'm a rale chap that will astonish the ivy gintlemen underneath, you kin bet your swate life on that."

"See here, boy, I see you are fond of money, brisk and shrewd. If I give you more money, can I trust you?"

"Kin you trust me! Faith you wudn't be the first man that's thrusted me, as every cutter in Jamestown will tell you."

"Well, I rather like your appearance—rather a clever sort of a lad. The fact is, I've a little job on hand that will pay you well if you manage it right alone. If you'll assist me, and do your work up right, you shall be liberally rewarded. What say you, my boy?"

"Well, op'n, I'm in the market. Let's have yer money."

"I never pay till the work is done—that has been the rule of my life—but you shall be well paid, if you do what I shall tell you.

"My name is Quirk Quibbleton, Esq., attorney-at-law, and general land agent, &c., &c., I am the testamentary guardian of the young lady in the house here—Miss McRae. Furthermore, I expect in the course of a few weeks to become her natural and legal guardian for life, or marrying her.

"That young quack of a doctor underneath the tree, has got a notion that he can get the cash from me. The old man, her uncle, is opposed to it, and I'm opposed to it myself, and between us we hold the purse strings, and they govern everything—do you understand, eh?

"Now, my business here to-night is to see the old gentleman, but as I found that cursed doctor in the house, I thought it best to secrete myself until he is out of the way, because—because I have got a very violent temper, and if I should meet him, I'm afraid I might hurt him, or else he might hurt me, which would be a great disadvantage to you know. I have good reason to believe that Miss Lucretia are laying their heads together for an elopement—not because the girl cares anything at all for him—but she's a young, giddy thing, and had just as lief elope as not, simply for the romance of the thing, and because, too, she thinks it will spite her uncle and me.

"Now, if it is as I suppose, as soon as the doctor's interesting friend sees Miss McRae in a big rock in the corner of the orchard behind the house. What I want of you, is to go there and like a gentleman, offer your services and report it to me. In the meantime, as soon as the doctor's gone, I must have a talk with the old gentleman, Mr. Pringle.

"The dog is out of the way at present, and will be, until you can get down from your present position, when you can slip down from here without attracting attention, and run around to the rock. Meet me in an hour, or as soon after the interview between the old gentleman and I is over, as you can, at the little gate at the end of the lane, and if you follow my instructions, and obtain the desired information, I will give you five dollars."

Whoo-ray! Paddy's born to good luck! Sure now, give us yer hand, ould sir, Mr. Squire Quibbleton, Esq., attorney-at-law, &c., you're a magnificent man—honor, so ye are."

With the agility and nonchalance of a squirrel, Tappy slided to the ground on the opposite side of the tree from where Mr. Pringle and his guest were seated, and made his way to the orchard, where he had no difficulty in finding the designated rock.

Half an hour afterwards, just as Tappy began to think that Squire Quibbleton had been hoaxing him, he heard the sound of voices in the room from behind the rock. Dr. Hippocrates Quackrody and Miss McRae were standing within arm's length of him.

The copies was right; as elopement was on the tapis. Dr. Quackrody had a fair of the case before projected in such a pleading, oily, insinuating, audacious tone on the part of the sloper, or succeeded on the part of the eloper, with such an outburst of girlish, thoughtless glee; positively as a spoiled and petted child of fifteen might be expected to succeed in accomplishing anything the prospect of sure fun, and a rare opportunity of revenge upon a tyrannical, fussy old uncle, and a persevering, intriguing suitor in the shape of a fortune hunting

Here the two also listened, wondered at the thoughtless, reckless levity displayed in the tones of this child-woman, at the prospect of playing such a practical joke on her old guardian, relation. Not a particle of affection for the man who proposed to assist her in this delectable enterprise, not the slightest shade of doubt, thought of, or care for the consequence to herself, was manifested. To this ardent, sparkling, spirited child, to grow weary of the peevish domination of her uncle, and the amorous advances of a disagreeable suitor—old enough to be her father—the affair proposed was merely a harmless frolic, calculated to relieve the tiresome monotony of her every-day existence.

The doctor, elated by his success, escaped to seal the compact on her lips, and was replaced with a sympathetic kiss, and in this that brought a shy full of meteors across his vision.

"To-morrow night at midnight!" was the time; that same old rock the place—and a horse and buggy in the point of woods on the top of the hill, the means of transportation to the Maryland line, and I was settled, and a certain little lady graciously condescended to allow the tips of her fingers to be pressed for a moment by the man she was about to run away from home and friends with.

CHAPTER III.

"How did it happen? Why, easy enough. The girl, you know, rides like a witch—that, as sticks on like a limpet, can ride over the high water level water, she must have her canter every day on the bank of black Nell. Well, yesterday afternoon, after the usual gallop, a little, she started out as usual, very much against my wishes, Squire Quibbleton; but, ha! she's just like a spoiled child, and she will have her own way about things, you know. Well, sent here, at Mulberry Hill, at the usual crossing, the mare got frightened at something, and ran away with her. Now, of course, you know is pretty spirited, though gentle enough for common. Well, she's got some of the best blood in her that's to be found in old Virginia—the mare, I mean."

"Yes, yes, I know, I'm aware. You are as proud of the blood of your horses as you are of your own."

"Very well—every whit! air, and have as much reason. However, that's got nothing to do with the story. Cretia crabbe the animal like a cross old maid as she is, and no doubt would have usually pulled her in, but the creature took the cross road for a bridle—"

"Bless me!"

"Yes. The bridge, you know, over Tumble Creek, has just been carried away by the freshet, though Cretia didn't know anything about that. Round the sharp turn went black Nell, down the hill, and, at one jump, landed in the middle of the boiling creek!"

"Good heavens! dear me! You don't say so! How did she get out? I saw the stream this morning, and she one scathing, foaming torrent, ten times its usual size. I had been there, Mr. Pringle, I—I'm afraid I should have jumped in and committed suicide in the attempt to save her."

"Oh, pshaw! squire. You know you never did anything so foolish as that in your life. However, in fact, that is just what a bold fellow did do."

"How? You don't mean—jumped in and committed suicide—"

"Not at all. He jumped in, though, and saved her life and his own, too."

"You don't say so! Who was he?"

"Don't know. You see it happened to be close by the Yankee camp, and—"

"Oh, one of those cursed thin coats, was it? Just like them; these fellows are so confoundedly impertinent!"

"Very true, squire. Still, I can't help thinking that, if I had been in Creole's place, I could have very well excused a piece of impertinence like that —under the circumstances, you know."

"No, sir—no, sir! There's no excuse for such an—an—what the deuce was the fellow doing there? What business had he to wear his hair so? In fact, sir, what business had Miss Lucretia to ride out all? It's an—an—it's an unwarrantable interference, sir. You must talk to the girl—I'll talk to her myself. Who knows! Just as likely as not the young scapegrace will be failing in love with her, or she with him. Young ladies are always romantic—particularly after such a wetting as she has had; and if it should turn out so, I'll note well you what, Mr. Pringle, we shall have more trouble than we have had with the doctor."

"Nothing, nothing in that, Faith, I didn't think of that," said Mr. Pringle, fidgetting nervously. "But, squire, I have no fears. There's not in Miss Lucretia Mellon a vain noble blood—in fact, sir, the blood of the Pringles, although she bears another name—and, however grateful she might be to her deliverer, she would never so far demean herself."

"Demean herself! Don't talk to me about demeaning, Mr. Pringle, I understand the nature of such girls better. Why, what would you say if I should tell you that I'd even now got Sandy a plan to run away with the quack doctor?"

"What! what! Why, I should say, Squire Quibbleton, that you have forgot your judgment, that you—you—that you are egregiously mistaken —deceived. No girl with a drop of Pringle blood in her veins could be guilty of such a thing; besides, sir, don't we know that she's to be the possessor of all the Quibbleton estate—that it's out and out her heir in the world—the last of my line—and haven't many more days to number? And don't we know that she should be above being like that that I'll—I'll make a will, and—and give my property to Jeff Davis, or Satan himself, sooner than allow the heiress to jump? Don't we know that the whole of her own property is now in your hands, and that if you mistrusted that she'd ever thought of marrying, that you'd—you'd confiscate the whole of it? The thing, squire, is—it's absurd."

"The thing, Mr. Pringle, is a fact, nevertheless, as I will prove to you by the mouth of an eyes and ear witness. I've got to go with me to Sandy at the end of the lane. You think that your niece is in her room at this very moment, as she ought to be, and that I am coming quack, who got you a short time ago, is on his way home; but you are mistaken, my dear sir—woefully mistaken. Sandy, I am noticing, has not the son of a prophet, I would, nevertheless, make a small bet that they are both at this moment enjoying a fine cigar each at the back side of the garden. What do you think of that, Mr. Pringle?"

"Fire and furies, sir! What do I think? I won't think such talk as that, not even from my honorn friend. Do you mean to say, sir—do you dare to presume to say that a girl with Pringle blood in her veins—would— I'll go right straight myself, and—"

"Mr. Pringle, keep cool, don't get excited; you know you're dreadfully nervous. Don't you see I'm cool, and I'm a lover, you know, as well as the girl's grandfather, and right sorry to feel as much interest in the matter as you. The difference, Mr. Pringle between you and me is, that you, in all your pride, have been taught to believe that everything is as it appears to be; while I have been accustomed to find that everything appears to be to be a sham. You are always blindly trusting; I am always on the alert—suspecting. Why! do you know I suspect everybody and everything, habitually, systematically? I don't even trust you or myself altogether. I don't even trust you, when I want you to trust occasionally. Perception, Mr. Pringle, penetration, knowledge of human nature, is a great thing in politics, as well with one's affairs as the world. Why, I can look right into a man at a glance and tell whether he's reliable or not. I have never been deceived in my life, sir. It was only to-night, as I was on my way here, I'd ceased to meet a shrewd, intelligent looking fellow that I had never seen before; and although he was clad in the hisied uniform of a Yankee soldier, I was struck with his keen appearance, asked him a few questions, and engaged him on the spot to perform a most important service. What do you suppose it was, Mr. Pringle?"

"How can I tell?"

"Well, sir, it was to go to the big rock in the corner of the garden, and secrete himself there, so as to be able to report correctly the plan of the elopement, which I have the best of reasons for believing will be laid at the regular meeting this night, between Miss Lucretia and Quackwody. Do you understand, sir?"

"Eloped! Regular meeting! An Irish bosby hired to dog the steps of my niece! Demons and darkness, Quirk Quibbleton, what are my house! I repeat, you've insulted my whole line. Do you know that she to whom you refer has got the blood of the Pringles in her veins; and do you think that she could talk of elopements, and hold 'regular meetings' under my very nose, with—with a man who has not met her in my own house? Go, sir—go! No man who talks thus can be friend of mine, even remotely!"

"Joh Pringle! Do I deserve that at your hands? Twenty years ago, when your house and your land once were carried away by a flood that has never been equalled in this valley, save by the present, did I—— But, ah, I see your eye softon now. You know who befriended you then, who rode night and day along the stream, until he was at length enabled to bring back the mournful intelligence of their fate. Well, let it pass. I can forgive you. You have never been the same man since, that you were before that dreadful catastrophe. What I have said in regard to Miss Lucretia I have good reasons for saying, as I shall show you. Come with me."

Squire Quibbleton led the way to the gate at the end of the lane, where he had agreed to meet Tappy, the drummer-boy.

"Now, then, Pringle, there's my saw Irish that I picked up to-night, for the first time. He's punctual to the minute. Ah, it's a great thing to have an observing eye, and be a diligent judge. I've been deceived in my man yet," whispered the squire complacently, as they caught sight of Tappy, seated on the gate-post, whistling "Rally Round the Flag, Boys."

Tappy's report was made greatly to the gratification of the squire, and to the mortification of Mr. Pringle.

"And you are sure that one o'clock was the hour appointed, my lad?" asked the squire at the conclusion.

"Sure, sir! to be sure I'm sure, as much as I am that I'm talking to gentlemen this minute," responded Tappy, stuffing his promised reward into his pocket.

Squire Quibbleton did not wait to reflect upon any latent meaning they might have been conveyed in Tappy's words, but turned towards his companion, muttering:

"It's no wonder they didn't make it midnight; that's the romantic hour. Faith I but won't they be astonished to find themselves tricked!"

"Astonished! but won't somebody else be astonished to find himself tricked, ye old hillguard!" muttered Tappy.

CHAPTER IV.

"Well, Tappy, so here you are at last! What has kept you so long?" inquired Mr. Here I've been waiting half the night for you. Give an account of yourself."

"Why, sir—an' indade—lieutenant—give a fellur a little time to get breath—won't you? Sure I've run mo breath clane out of me body thryin' to get up wid you, an' I'm only baste ur a dog—dog that carries away the sate o' me trousers, an—an' made me shmir a hole in me shirt, too. An' as for the rest, you might inter a sossidge wid hayther, wid a cape over his face, by the name of Squire Squibbleton, or anothership of that kind, for the Colonel girl, wants to marry her bodies, an' he got me tostand on picket for him a while, while he tell-ed for the cord. Be-dad—ah—an' I'm not sure but I'll have the money yet—an' so I hid behind the rock an' heard all about the girl and a fellow they call Quirk, and how they slep' last night at two in the mornin' wid each other an' got married; though it's plain enough the girl don't care a button for him, and that she never met the fun o' the thing, an' had just as hef run away wid one good-looking fellur as another—an' I believe, from what I've seen of the girl myself this very minute, case when I sullored her to the house afterwards, and pretended as though I'd met some of the fellurs on the road, and I inquired her the flowers, an' save I, as partic as I have how, she says: 'Lieutenant Dunean, this has been a day I remember her very words, for I thought at the time I never saw a swather look so much like a gintleman as you do.' Now, lieutenant, sure I can never be sufficiently grateful for what he has done for me; and that, whether we ever meet again or not, I shall claim the privilege of considering him as among my very best friends.' An' when she turned away from me entirely, and I was going to look up to her eye that would have made yer heart jump, I can tell you. I tell you what, if I was in your place, sir——"

"Stop, stop, for mercy's sake! You overwhelm me, Tappy," purged Lieutenant Duncan, trying to keep from his companion's view a most mortification thou buried at him. "You run the breath out of your body, did you? Really, it's a body that can't run as fast as that you did. I'm afraid I couldn't keep up with you. If so the doctor has persuaded Miss Mellon to elope with him, has he? Well, I'm afraid, musingly, seizing upon the point that pressed him most sorely.

"Why, sir, that is, if you don't stop her, as I know you can, an' as I believe you've got the pluck to do. The girl will ruin herself, jest to spite that old bachelor of an uncle, who's dead been on having her to marry her guardian, Squire Shibleton, who's quite enough to have spoiled a dozen girls, let alone one christened, be jabers! and who don't care the snap o' his thumb about the girl, only for the property that she'll have when she's got her money. That's all—that's all! I can see!"

"I'm what would you have me do, Tappy? Burst off with the girl myself, disguised as the doctor? Upon my word, on ordinary occasions I wouldn't mind a bold, unpardonable, astounding like thing; but, somehow, with her—I couldn't deceive her. Shall I go openly and try to persuade her not to have a second husband? What do you?"

"Sure, sir, I'm not the one to give advice, but what, say, to set yourself up as my adviser? You're a sagacious youngsiver, what shall I do, Tappy?"

"Well, you see, I thought maybe you'd like to have a finger in the pie, and so I thought that if you'd heard that the runaway was to come off at one o'clock, when in fact the time agreed upon by the doctor and Gentle Lucretia was for dead ten yo see. Now you beat the big rock at the bottom of the orchard behind the house, at twelve o'clock, and the fairy, came after Pringle and her guardeen sint a going to interfere until the last minute. After three pounds this evening, you shall be at my assistance to go to the village. I'll find out where the doctor resides, and I'll have all the horses off his waggin in a jiffy, so I'll take me oath he don't reach the big rock before one o'clock will a whole skinful of he does then. So you'll have a whole hour all to yourself, to use as you see proper. An' a good dale can be done in the way o' marrying a gall, in an hour, if one is properly inclined for it."

"You're a genius, Tappy," said the lieutenant laughing and then meekly throwing himself upon his sof, he continued in a soliloquising tone, "Shall I do it? She's but a simple, spirited, thoughtless child; and I allow her to throw herself away thus? I rescued her from a watery grave. By she gods! she shall not now take a leap more dreadful in its probable consequences than the one she then took, without one effort of mine to prevent her."

"Tappy!" raising himself to his feet, "I am with you."

Quirk Quibbleton, Esq., attorney-at-law and general land agent, was, as he had said, not the man to put implicit confidence in any body. His whole life had been occupied in dealing out fraud, deceit, and cunning villany, to the world; and he had found that what he meted should would might be tempted to repay in kind.

So, in this instance, Quirk, upon mature deliberations, conceived that it would not be best to put too much faith in his own much vaunted judgment and penetration in a newly-found friend, but resolved to see for himself.

Considerately providing himself with a couple of stout bludgeons as well as a bold gravel, and prevent any misadventure to his own precious person in the possible scuffle that might ensue between himself and his audacious rival, the doctor, Quirk took up a favorable position for observation in the neighborhood of the rock before mentioned, on the next night, at the seasonable hour of eleven; leaving the rheumatic representative of the Quibbleton race—who had a horror of the night air—reposing in an unshaken faith in the vigilance of his ally, and the downy ease of a four-post bedstead.

At midnight, Quirk had the unbounded satisfaction of seeing the closely-wrapped figure of a female, attended by a man, and, almost simultaneously, his ward come tripping lightly up the path leading from the house, with her bonnet on her hands, humming a snatch of pastoral melody, as unescorted as a milkmaid going to her task.

Quirk's heart bounded within him, as though it would burst at the sight, and he gave forth an exclamation from the lady, and saw her start with surprise—but he saw nothing more.

Lieutenant Duncan, behind him, as though by a preconcerted plan had been turned loose, with his bottles tied to their tails.

Quirk, thus disarmed, and clung to her companion for protection; the two stout fellows blinded by the dust, and the rear of the animals with a good round oath a piece; the last of his line, dozing in the colossal arm-chair by the open window, in the garden mama s'wig, with his bald pate enveloped in a night-cap, started downstairs and up the garden walk with as much speed as his short and rotundure would admit of. Quirk Quibbleton lay crushed and mangled on the sod, while away over the fields, with ear-piercing shrieks of fear and agony, sped the phantom of a horse, with the debris of a wagon flying at the traces.

A wondering group gathered around the wounded man as the sibilings-come of the Pringle mansion whose name he had learned for the occasion. No doctor was there, but instead, the commanding form of a Federal lieutenant, while a tall, slender figure had hovered in attentive spectator of the scene.

Mr. Pringle, fidgety, fussy Mr. Pringle, in his night-cap, dressing-gown and slippers, dropped a pillow-case that, in his confusion and dismay he had caught up instead of a shawl, and gazed in astonishment at the stranger. Even the groaning wretch on the sofa, catching a glimpse of that familiar face, ceased his lamentations, and even raised his head to get a better view.

"Who—who are you, sir?" gasped the white old man, recovering his voice, and finding a chair for support.

"Pooh," said Miss Lucretia, "this is Lieutenant Duncan—the gentleman who saved my life!"

With a deep groan the wretch on the sofa fell back in a swoon.

"Who—who—who—did you say? Duncan—Duncan—Lieutenant Duncan! I—it cannot be—shall not I say it shall not be!" fairly shrieked Mr. Pringle, beside himself with excitement. "Quirk Quibbleton—Quirk, you—you if you do now I'll never forgive you! Get up."

As if inspired by the irresistible magic of his words, Quirk Quibbleton man groaned, and opened his eyes with a bewildered stare. Finally they rested once more on the lieutenant, and by force of that magnetism drew him to his side.

"Who are you?" asked Duncan. "I have seen you before, I think."

Without answering the question, Quibbleton addressed himself to Mr. Pringle.

"That was what the temptor said to me, and I yielded. I buried my secret in my bosom, and schooled myself to look down into the arid recesses of your desert heart without compunction.

"But—it's all up with me now. That accursed hornet my leg is smashed to a jelly. Here, Mr. Pringle is your long lost son. And you, sir, are no longer Lieutenant Duncan; you are Harry Pringle that was carried off by the Indians forty odd years ago. Honest Jemmy Duncan, of Pittsburg, is my poor foster father. You have a belief around your neck!"

The young man produced it wonderingly. Twas a dainty affair, attached to a silken cord, and containing a diminutive likeness of the pretty Mr. Pringle, younger by a score of years, with an infant boy and girl upon his knee. It was the picture of the honest Jemmy Duncan had found upon the neck of his little foundling, and which had always remained there surrounded by a veil of sacred mystery.

At sight of that well-remembered trinket, and the countless rills of a father's love overflowed in their long dear and barren water-courses, and poured about side in copious showers from eyes unused to tears for so old man took to his heart once more, the idol that had been dead and buried for twenty years.

With attempt to transfer to poor paper the matchless tints of the rainbow, the fragrance of the crushed flower, or the sacred symphonies of a parent's love suddenly waked to life by the breath of a child recovered from the tomb?

Human speech and language—is more susceptible to ludicrous appearances than the most sublime sentiment. Those who fail to fully appreciate the feelings of the father, can, at least, laugh at the follies of Pringle the aristocrat.

"And so," said Mr. Pringle, addressing himself to the newly-identity like a man trying on a new coat, "and so the dead carried me away, it seems, and you brought me back again."

"Ah!" said Mr. Pringle, the elder, addressing himself to Dr. Quackready who had now arrived, and stood in wondering, awe-struck group at the gate on his left cheek, "there's a certain something about blood that will always—hamper it however you will—defy all rules and ascertain principles—if it has any—at unexpected crises. Who but a Pringle would ever have thought of jumping into a blazing stable for the purpose of saving the life of an unknown female?"

"Father, I will not venture upon a reply. He was altogether too much chagrined and bewildered by the events of the night, including the loss of a valuable horse and the prospect of an immediate alliance with the heroes of the Pringle estates, to fully comprehend the new order of things. Two facts, however, he did not fail to impress himself with, the face upon him; one, that Miss McRae was test to him for ever; and the other, that Quirk Quibbleton was dead, he had at his hands a splendid subject upon which to test the benign operations of the Amnesty proclamation. Here was a delicate subject, above all others, most acceptable to the experimental investigations of the new-born zeal that had incited many to the cause. Upon him the doctor could watch the effects of his nostrum with a most sublime indifference as to whether it killed or cured.

After heaping his victim upon the rack for several days, the knife of an army surgeon (or was it a butcher?) was finally applied to the unfortunate Quibbleton, for at the expense of a limb.

"What's the use living for my sake of mind, that I didn't turn out to be your father's son instead of my father's son?" exclaimed Lieutenant Pringle, to himself afterwards, in bitter accents.

"Why so, sir?" she asked demurely.

"Why? 'cause—because there's nothing in the world I'd like to keep cousins from marrying you know."

"Provided they agree to do so, eh?"

"Provided they agree to do so, eh? You most decidedly wished for," quoth Mr. Pringle (Richard was himself again)—"thereby preserving the blood of the Pringles in a direct manner, you can't deny it, and be the wife of my heir, although you cannot be my heir, since I belong to the younger generation myself—and a direct descendant of the Pringles—and I am no longer the last of my line."

SOVEREIGNS DINING AND SUPPING IN PUBLIC.

The custom was observed at an early period, for we find Richard II. and King Henry IV. and Isabella, or France, kept their court at Westminster during the ceremonial festivals of Christmas and Easter, as they were dining in public in the great banqueting-hall, a woman in a mask entered on horseback, and rode up to the royal table, where she spoke to King Edward, who, imagining that it contained some important secret or state communication, ordered it to be opened and read aloud for the amusement of his courtiers; but, to his great mortification, it was found to contain only unkingly reproaches, setting forth in no measured terms all the calumnies which his unpopularity had brought upon him. Then the woman was immediately taken into custody, and committed to the Tower, followed by a crowd of people. The knight boldly acknowledged what he had done, and said, "that, supposing it to be a matter of importance, he had taken that method of apprising him of the complaints of his people."

Henry VIII. was very fond of "dining in public." There was such a resort to Bridewell Court on Sunday, July 24, 1514, to see their majesties dine that the surrounding the table to keep and causing some to fall, made the number of persons who lost their lives on that occasion to be reckoned at four. And, "On Thursday, the feast of St. Augustine, it is stated, there were present at the royal majesty's dinner in public at Hampton Court Palace, the Archbishop of Canterbury (the second personage of that day), named the ministers among the nobility who waited on the king, and the ladies who waited on the ladies 'gentle men ushers and lords' supports carr on ye number.'" Again, on July 26th of the same year, "Their majesties dined together in public at Windsor in the presence of the Emperor's ambassador, and during their stay there, which all the country people, whether men or women, were permitted to be present at."

Besides these three occasions of Charles II. and Queen Caroline dining in public, on the coronation day, attended with some circumstances, as mentioned in the London Gazette of 1821, of state by August 1, 1717, "the king, being Sunday, their Majesties, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Princess Amelia, however, went to chapel at Hampton Court—and heard a sermon preached by the Bishop of Peterborough. Their majesties, and the rest of the royal family, dined afterwards in public as usual, before a great number of spectators."

THE SARATOGA RACES—VIEW OF THE GRAND STAND—THE HORSES STARTING.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.

THE SARATOGA RACES.

THE races at Saratoga this season have been unusually brilliant, and to all lovers of "a fair field and no favor," extremely satisfactory. The weather was most auspicious, and the public interest in the races seemed to be greater than was ever before manifested at that fashionable summer resort.

Most noticible among the many splendid turnouts on the road, was Mr. Simson Leland's four-in-hand, which attracted universal attention. For the first race, on Monday, there were entered six horses—Bowie & Hall's Richmond, Alesia, Maiden, Sarah K. Bush and Grimstead. The mile and three-quarters was made in 3 minutes 13½ seconds, Maiden being first by a length. Alesia second, and Richmond third, and the rest nowhere.

The second race, on the same day, of two mile heats, was even more exciting, and at the close of the last heat, when there was a desperate contest, was bewildering. Five horses were entered—Arcola, Aldebaran, Fleetwing, Annie Butler and Thunder. Arcola was first in both heats—time, 3:42½ and 3:41½. Fannie Butler and Fleetwing, were respectively, second; Aldebaron got in third at last.

On Tuesday only three horses were entered for the first race, the Saratoga Cup, Kentucky, Rhinodyne and Capt. Moore's horse. The heat was two miles and a quarter, and the betting was very heavy, Kentucky being the favorite. The three got a fair start, and Rhinodyne led off in the first half closely followed by Moore. On the second mile, the trial was reduced down to the latter and Kentucky. Kentucky kept a little ahead during the rest of the race and came in by a length ahead.

The second race of the day was between five horses, Arcola, Lexington, Lexicon, Monmouth and Southerner. The first heat was made in 1:45½, Arcola, the favorite in the betting, getting the lead and keeping it throughout. The contest for the second place was between Lexicon and Lexington, which continued close to the stand. The second heat demonstrated the superiority of Arcola. He came in by neck—time, 1:46.

The race on the 25th, for a purse of $500, for three year olds, a mile and a half, was very exciting, and drew large crowds to the track. Baltimore was the winner by a neck—time, 2:41½. The favorites were beaten, and the losses of their backers were heavy. Clita came in second, Gilda was third, and Blue Flag fourth.

The second race was for the Saratoga stakes for two year olds; distance, one mile. In this contest Ulrica was the victor; time, 1:51¾. Prophet was second, Salmoneus third, and Lightning fourth.

The third trial was for all ages; purse, $300; distance, a mile and a quarter. Arcola was the victor in 2:13½; Minnie Roth came next; Nellie Graves third; Ludeme fourth; Climax fifth; Richmond sixth.

The purse for all ages, which concluded the sports of the day, brought a field of six, and gave rise to a considerable speculation outside of the previous favorite, Arcola—the stable mate of Kentucky—who was booked the winner, and was so backed by a length.

On Thursday, of the five horses entered, Throgsneck won the first race—time, 2:42. The second race—Purse $1,000 for all ages—two three-mile heats, which might have involved a nine mile race had there been a tie, was won by Fleetwing. Time, 5:31½. First mile, 1:56.

The first race on Friday resulted in Baltimore being declared the winner. Time, for two miles, 3:41½; first mile, 1:51. The second race, after a hot contest with Madeleine, was won by Lexington. Time, 1:51.

The races closed on Saturday. The running comprised a hurdle race, a walk over, a mile dash, and a mile handicap race. The latter was the feature of the day, no less than seven heats being run before the contest was decided in favor of Thunder. The owners of Fleetwing challenged Kentucky to run a four-mile race on Monday, but the challenge was declined.

All of the contests were of the most exciting character, and the city was filled to overflowing with strangers. Had it not been for the great Union Hotel, around whose Lind it not been for the great Union Hotel, around whose capacious dining-room tables 1,500 people can be accommodated at one time, there would have been but little chance for the comfort and convenience of thousands.

THE METROPOLITAN FIRE COMMISSIONERS

And Chief-Engineer Kingsland.

PROBABLY no change in any municipal department of the city of New York has been attended with so much discussion as the establishing of a Paid Fire Department in the metropolis. After the display of considerable legal acumen the Court of Appeals finally decided that the act of the Legislature creating the department was constitutional, and the New Commissioners—C. C. Finckney, Martin B. Brown, F. W. Engeer—C. C. Finckney, Martin B. Brown, F. W. Engeer, W. Booth, at once entered upon their duties. After the usual preliminary business of organization, Mr. Elisha Kingsland was chosen Chief-Engineer. We believe this appointment has the perfect approval of every brave this appointment has the perfect approval of every fireman in New York, and we know that we cannot make a more acceptable offering to them than the portrait we publish in our present number.

The four Commissioners are all well-known and popular men, and have been all of them, more or less, connected with the department they are now called upon to preside over.

THE NEW STEAM FIRE-ENGINE, METROPOLITAN NO. 1.

THE new steam fire-engine, Metropolitan, No. 1, built for the Metropolitan Fire Commissioners at the Amoskeag Works, Manchester, has been tried and has proved to be one of the finest steamers in New York. The engine when "running to a fire" will be drawn by two horses, and will be taken care of by experienced men, who will be paid liberal salaries by the commissioners.

The boiler of the steamer is 36 inches in diameter, and 65 inches in length; it contains 318 copper tubes, 24 inches long and one and a quarter inches in diameter, made of the best boiler plate, of a suitable thickness, made of the best boiler plate, of a suitable thickness, cased in wood and covered with Russian iron, with brass bands, and with a brass dome and chimney casing.

There are two double-acting pumps, lined with brass, four and a quarter inches in diameter and 12-inch stroke, with rubber valves and brass valve seats.

The steam cylinders are eight inches in diameter and 12-inch stroke, working on the same piston rods with the pumps.

The engine is supplied with two lengths of best rubber suction hose, made upon copper rings, four and a half inches in diameter inside. The suction pipe of the pumps is fitted on each side with a brass cap, to close the openings if desired; and with a vacuum chamber made of burnished copper.

There are two discharge pipes for the leading hose with a complete set of "nozzles" for change, from one and a half inch to seven-eighth inch diameter. Altogether the Metropolitan, for beauty of finish and strength of construction, may be considered, par excellence, the best in the city.

LOSS OF THE STEAMSHIP GLASGOW.

THE British steamship Glasgow, of the Inman line, which was burned on the 31st ult., while on her passage from New York to Liverpool, is another appalling evidence of the perils of ocean navigation. Among the many dangers that beset humanity by sea and land, there is none more terrible than that which startles the mariner on the wide wastes of waters with the cry of "fire!" To be one among hundreds of panic-stricken human beings crowded upon the deck of a burning ship, no sail, no land in sight; far as the eye can reach the monotonous waves heaving in pitiless placidity, and to see the lurid flames belching forth from below, hissing and curling about the cordage and the masts, to feel their hot breath come nearer and nearer, with no refuge from the most agonizing tortures, except to the equally fatal embrace of the surrounding billows. It is a picture fearful to imagine—then how horrible to realize. Providentially on this occasion no lives were lost, and some two hundred and fifty passengers were rescued by the barque Rosamond, and were safely returned to New York on the evening of the 3d of August.

THE following anecdote is told of Daniel O'Connell. Meeting a prelate pamphleteer, whose productions generally found their way to the butterman, he said, "I saw something very good in your new pamphlet this morning." "Ah!" replied the gratified writer, "what was it?" "A pound of butter," was the reply.

HE who, by his conduct, makes good friends on the one hand, and bitter haters on the other, gives evidence that there is something of the bold, independent, upright man in his composition; while the chicken-hearted, imbecile character is capable of making neither friends nor foes.

DEATH.

BY FANNIE BRUCE COOK.

We are marching, ever marching,
To the open gates of death;
We are nearing with each moment,
With each pulse throb, and each breath;
Ever onward is life's journey,
Never backward can we turn,
Though all rugged be the pathway,
And the skies look dark and stern.

Some are hast'ning, madly hast'ning,
On to meet the victor knight,
Others loiter by the wayside,
And will shrink to face his blight;
While 'mid rev'ling scenes of pleasure,
Crowds are gather'd in the dance,
Hearts are smitten ev'ry instant
By the ghostly monarch's lance.

The marriage bells glad ringing
On the shining air they send,
Yet each knell brings bride and bridegroom,
Ever nearer to Time's end;
The warrior, proudly rushing,
'Mid the fearful battle's strife,
For country or for glory,
Yields to Death his mortal life.

See the maid, in love's first dreaming,
Cast, like faded lily down;
'Mid life's sorrowing or gladness
All must meet Death's blasting frown.
Lo, he gathers youth like roses,
Locks whitening with Time's snow,
Young manhood and the baby face,
By his spell are stricken low.

In the land of fair Italia,
Or the icy, frigid zone,
Mortal captives aye are falling
'Round the ruthless slayer's throne.
We are marching, ever marching,
To the open gates of death,
We are nearing with each moment,
With each pulse throb and each breath.

CHAPTER IV.—RICHARD SLEUTH FINDS—ONLY TO LOSE AGAIN—HIS TREASURE.

Richard Sleuth stands for a moment after reading the codicil close by the open door of the safe, as if hesitating whether or no to return the paper to its place of deposit. He would doubtless prefer to keep the precious document under his own eye and custody till the alderman dies, which may not be many hours—nay, may even happen within a space to be reckoned only by minutes—but he is deterred by the obvious danger. Should any one properly authorised be sent by the old man to the safe—the lawyer, for instance, whose visit Sleuth particularly dreads—it might seriously compromise him to have it known that he had secretly abstracted it, and that he possessed a false key to the safe.

As he turned the paper over end over, he then first noticed, and, by the light of his guttering candle, read the pencil writing on the back, which was so faint as to be almost illegible—

"For Richard Sleuth, if——" and there the writer had stopped.

"If I pleased him, I suppose he meant to say," was the nephew's inner comment, while a strange look—half a smile, half a sneer—passed across his smooth face. "I have tried anyhow. I haven't forgot Anthony's offence—plain speaking. He shan't make me wince, whatever he says, so long as he only talks; but doing is another matter. 'Ware that, uncle!

"What's that—a bell ringing? Not his, I think, and if not it don't concern me."

But as Sleuth listens, with certain uneasiness as to what the incident portend—if, for instance, the alderman is calling the servants to his room to witness something—he hears quite other sounds—sounds that strike him as unusual. He cannot for some time make out what they are like, they are so low and muffled, but at last he fancies they are produced by the effort to lift up or force open some wooden structure, that creaks and splits with every attempt. There is a pause, the sounds apparently have ceased, and he is thinking of returning to the old man, to say that he can discover no traces of robbers, when again they begin. Evidently a shutter or door below is being forced open—probably by a crowbar. Yet would thieves go on with such operations while a light is visible through the window—the light from Sleuth's own candle? Surely not?

Perhaps, however, they have seen the light so often since the alarm has been given, and the servants have roamed over the house to explore, that they have ceased to care for them. They may be growing reckless and impatient, as the night wears on and their work is unaccomplished.

Then he thinks with alarm of himself being seen so engaged, with the open door of the safe. He blows out his candle, and in the darkness returns the codicil to its place, not without a thrill, partly at the unexpected sound of the gold he had rattled, but chiefly through the fear he may never again get hold of the coveted paper.

Withdrawing the key, and putting it, for security's sake, at the bottom of his watch-pocket—the watch being then worn in the trousers—he went to the window, drew back cautiously an inch or two of the blind, and looked out. For several minutes he saw nothing but the gentle swaying in the moonlight of the tops of the majestic poplars, which had found in the upper air the breeze which was so much wanted below. He was about to go away, when he felt as if a dead man's hand had suddenly been put upon his heart, and he saw first one figure pass across the ground below, between the poplars and the house, and then another, both evidently coming towards the balcony of this very room, which was a considerable height from the ground, but might, no doubt, be ascended by such desperadoes.

Sleuth was, undoubtedly, a coward. He might or might not be capable, under sufficient stimulus, of acts that hardly belonged to the category of cowardice. But he had that instinctive animal dread of personal injury which is characteristic of cowards, and stands quite apart from the ideal sense of danger which at times makes the bravest quail, till they are face to face with the spectre of their thoughts, and can act, when fear is known no more.

Should he show himself at the window, or raise the blinds, or throw up the sash and shout? Or should he fire off one of the barrels of his weapon, which he had hastily taken from the top of the safe, at the first intimations of the robber's actual presence? He could not resolve to do any of these things, dreading the robbers would fire at him in return, or brain him by a sudden blow from a bludgeon, if he exposed himself at the window; for by this time one or both might be on the balcony outside watching for him.

Suddenly, and to his great relief, he hears a loud, clear whistle from the neighboring paddock, which belongs to the house. He looks, in the hope of seeing some moving figure there between the heaps of new mown hay. But though he can see no one, he hears again the same sound. Is it a signal to the robbers of danger?

No; it is too clear, too expressive of individual enjoyment, for that. Robbers don't whistle snatches of the last London popular melody to warn each other, and go on doing it. Will it not, then, alarm these wretches and drive them back? Scarcely has the thought swept across Sleuth's brain, before he sees the two men swiftly re-cross towards the poplar, and disappear in the shade beyond, no doubt, towards the boundary wall, which is there at its nearest point to the road. Sleuth breathes again, as he thinks he is not only himself secure from harm, but that the safe—the shrine that holds what now to him is a kind of sacred scripture—is no longer in danger of being broken into by robber bands.

As he returned to the sick chamber and reported briefly what he had seen and heard, the alderman, while accepting Sleuth's assurances that there was no longer any danger, seemed struck with the evidence thus given that the vagrant's warning had been a honest warning, and that, possibly, with the inquisitiveness and love of adventure of youth, it was he whose whistle had proved of such timely service.

"Give him a dish of victuals, Dick, and a crown piece to-morrow, if he comes across you. Or, better still, instead of the money, give him a job, to see what sort of stuff he is made of. Half of my best men in business I picked up by being always ready to give a promising fellow a chance."

As Sleuth listened to this speech (and of course promised attention to it), he was struck by the change in the alderman's face during the brief time he had been away. Though it was as pinched and discolored as ever, and oozing with a kind of dew which seemed wrung out of the suffering man by the severity of his pain-burden, the voice had lost its loud and offensive tone, and suggested an unwonted feeling of mental relief.

Had anything happened in his absence? or was it merely that the alderman was better, and no longer in fear of impending dissolution?

"The cordial once more, Dick," he said, with a certain cheeriness of manner. "It's drinking death, I know! Never mind; work must be done, even——"

The sounds died out to Sleuth's ear, though the alderman's lips still moved.

"Uncle, do you know I think you'll get better; I fancy I see a change already."

"It's a lie, Dick!" roared the alderman. "You don't. You know better. You ——"

Passion choked the remainder of what he had been going to say; and then, as he got quiet again, he felt sore and angry that his improved state of feeling—almost approaching to resignation—should have been so wantonly broken in upon by what he felt to be suggestions and assurances that no honest or true friend would give him at such a time.

Biting away at his finger nails, and striving to forget these provocations which he could not afford to resent, Sleuth, to make himself a job, went to the window and looked out. What is that he sees! Phillis, with her bonnet on, crossing the little back-yard to go to the outer door. He does not give himself time to ask why this should alarm him. He glides away, unnoticed by the alderman, into his little room—the dressing-room—closes the door, climbs through the open window, and drops to the ground by the aid of the pillars, where the rose thorns scratch his hands severely.

Phillis, at that moment about to open the door, hears a low sh—h! turns, and starts to see Richard, just as if she had thought she had never fully loved him.

"Oh! have you come out?" she said, trying to looked pleased. "Well, if you wait a minute, I shall be back directly; I'm only just going to run down to the lodge."

"Wait!" exclaimed Sleuth, gallantly offering his arm; "that's very likely, and let you go by yourself."

"Oh! but indeed I'm not at all frightened," Phillis protested eagerly, "and—and—your uncle. We mustn't both be away together."

"He sent me out for a few minutes' walk himself," said Sleuth; "and as he sent you, too, he'll know it's no use ringing his bell again till one of us comes back."

Phillis looked searchingly at him, and the hand under her shawl trembled. Sleuth's quick ear caught the sound of rustling paper. He stopped, and stopped her in the middle of the path.

"Phillis!"

"Richard, don't stop me, pray don't. I must go; I must, indeed," she said, bursting into tears.

Those tears gave Sleuth great strength. He had never before had the pleasure of making anything but animals weep. He felt there was no end to his power over this trembling girl.

"Give me that letter, Phillis," he demanded, holding out his hand. A great feeling of relief had come over him. Whatever had been done was easily undone, since Phillis was the old man's messenger.

Phillis laid her little hand on his arm, and lifted her brown eyes imploringly to his face; but Sleuth told himself that not only had he the letter safely in his keeping while it was in here, but that he would not be in a hurry to take the weight of his displeasure from her. What, then, was his astonishment, when Phillis said earnestly, almost passionately:

"Richard, you shan't have this letter. I know what it is. I know it may ruin all we have talked of, but I can't help it. It was one of those things we none of us can help. It took me all by surprise. But he begged me so, Richard, that I couldn't but promise; he told me he was dying, and how hard it went with him to die without seeing Mr. Anthony. He made me cry, Richard. He has been very kind to me, you know—how could I help promising?"

Sleuth looked at her a minute, contemptuously.

"I didn't suppose you'd refuse to promise," he said. "You would have been a little fool if you had. But, come, give us the letter, and have done with all this stuff. I don't know what's the matter with you to-night."

"Richard Sleuth!" said Phillis, "I may have altered in many ways since I came here, and since I saw you; but I never yet told a downright lie in my life, and I am not going to begin by breaking my word to a young man. I tell you plainly I'm going to send the gardener off on horseback to fetch Mr. Anthony. Try to prevent me, or meddle with the man, if you dare!"

Sleuth stood still in the path, but no longer in the superb attitude he had at first assumed. It began to dawn upon him that he had mistaken the extent of his power over Phillis. The love-making that he thought all over and done with, as regarded himself, had to be patiently began again to please her. He reflected, too, with savage despair, the lesson he had learned could not profit him tonight—the letter must go. Another word about keeping or delaying it, would do him more mischief with Phillis than he could repair. Besides, how could he afford to lose her help just yet?

He could not. It took him but an instant to think and decide this; then he stepped out of her way, dropping his face in his hands, just for a moment, before speaking to her.

"Oh, Phillis," he said huskily, "think of me as you like; tell my uncle all that has passed, if you like. I don't mind that. What I do mind and admire, is your splendid behavior. While you speak words which show me you have left off loving me, you make me love you a hundred times more. But go. Do your duty, noble girl. And if I can't but be sorry to see you helping away my uncle's wealth to a drunken spendthrift, it isn't because I lose it, but because one loses it who was born to grace such a sphere as I would have given her if——"

Sleuth was not so blinded with his emotion but he saw that Phillis was deeply affected by this speech.

"I believe that, Richard," she said; "I believe it from my heart; but it makes me all the more miserable to think you would have done a wrong to any one for my sake. Forgive all the unkind things I have said; but, indeed, it was hard to keep myself from doing wrong in this. Good-bye; I will not stay another minute."

"Ah! Phillis, you are too good for me," sighed Sleuth, as he kissed her cheek, wet with tears. Reversing his usual practice, in saying this he lied in his heart while his tongue told the truth.

A few minutes later he heard the tramp of a horse and the swing of the park gate. So did the alderman.

CHAPTER V.—RICHARD SLEUTH BEGINS TO DISCOVER HE IS A BORN ORATOR.

Sleuth's mind, as he left Phillis, would have been a study for a philosopher. He saw his three months' dream of future grandeur dying out, while yet unable to accept the fact as inevitable, that it was to prove but a dream. There could be no mistaking the alderman's intention in thus sending for Anthony. He was going to restore him to his former position as heir, and send him (Sleuth) back to the druggist's shop. Would the old man give him anything? Perhaps; perhaps not.

How long would Anthony be? It would not be humanly possible for him to come in less than three or four hours, even if all things were favorable. It was now ten o'clock. But Anthony might be out when the message arrived, spending the night in dissipation, or he might be away from London in the country, or he might be ill. Every additional hour's delay now was inconceivably precious. The codicil was in existence, was clear and absolute in its terms, was properly witnessed, was everything that heart of man could desire in his (Sleuth's) position, if only the alderman would let it alone but for a few hours, till, in fact, death should save him any further trouble.

Was it impossible for him, Sleuth, to do something even yet to propitiate the angry man, and keep him harmless till Anthony came, who might—Richard Sleuth only said to himself might—find his uncle dead? He must try. Going back through his dressing-room to the sick chamber, he says in his thickest and most buttery of tones—and they really have a kind of affectionate richness about them at such times—

"So, uncle, you have sent for Anthony! I am so glad! So very glad! I wanted to ask you to do it before, I really did, but was afraid to offend you."

"Hum! I acquit you, at all events, of ever trying," said the alderman, whom nothing that Sleuth said or did could please. Was he, the old man, foreseeing there would be an explosion, urging himself to be beforehand in making cause for his share in the quarrel?

"Yes, uncle," Richard went on, "I am quite thankful that we shan't have this said against us—that we couldn't forgive even at such a time; for you know, uncle, your cause is mine."

"Hum!" again muttered the sick alderman.

"And as to Anthony himself, he never could forgive himself for his behavior to you if he found you had been obliged to retain your disapprobation even unto ——"

"Death! Out with it, man! If I'm not afraid of the word, you needn't be."

"Yes, uncle, that's what I meant to say; and, of course, if you forgive him, as a Christian should, how much better to do it personally? Much better, isn't it, uncle?"

"Dick, let's have a few words, honest and straightforward on both sides, will you?"

"Yes, uncle," and Sleuth rubbed one hand over the other, as if in satisfaction that now he and his uncle were about to share a real bit of friendly and enjoyable confidence together. He came to the bedside, standing between the bed and the window, so that he might study the alderman's every look, now of painful interest to him, and not himself be taken unawares by any involuntary mismanagement of his face.

"Well, Dick, when I took you from the chemist's shop, you knew it was because Anthony had offended me. It doesn't matter now which was in the wrong, he or I. As you very properly say, a man in my position ought to be able to forgive, supposing Anthony to have been the chief offender. Well, I have been thinking a good deal while lying here, and the upshot is, I have sent for him, and you know, I suppose, what that means?"

"Yes, uncle, I think so," said Richard Sleuth, after a moment of terrible embarrassment, and making a new effort to arrest the stroke. "If you forgive him you would like to do something for him; of course, uncle, you will; and it's quite a pleasure to me to second that, if I may candidly speak out my opinion deferentially as becomes me as—as your heir."

"My heir!" thundered the old man. "What d'ye mean by that?"

"Didn't you, uncle, mean me to understand I was to be so when you brought me here?"

"And if I did; what then?"

Sleuth saw the dark, threatening look in the alderman's face, that warned him not to challenge the right of the dying man to alter his will a dozen times a day or night, if he pleased, so long as there was breath in the body and will in the soul to exercise the coveted power.

"Only this, uncle," said Richard, drawing courage from the conviction that he had already obtained a partial recognition of his claim; "that as, when I heard you say what you did, and saw how kindly you treated me, I said to myself—for I was a little frightened, I confess, about Anthony's offence, and said to myself, uncle, just this: 'If I do as Anthony did, I shall deserve to be treated as Anthony was—that's very clear.' Well, and then, uncle"—here the speaker found the richness of his tones affected by the exceeding dryness of his tongue, so he rather gulped down than drank half a glass of water, before the liquid was quite disposed of—"well, and then, uncle, I said, 'But if I don't behave like Anthony—if, knowing my uncle is a good man, and a wise man, and a strong man, I make up my mind to do just what he tells me, obey him in everything, never oppose him, try to please him always, and tend upon him, do all his errands, and fulfill all his little wants and wishes—if I do all this, I can't be wrong, for uncle is a just man, and he brought me here to be different from Anthony; and I will be different. Yes,' I said, 'he shall mould me as he likes. Who am I, that I shouldn't be glad to be taken by the hand, and made a man of? Yes,' I said, 'I shall put all my trust in uncle, and not mind my own likings and dislikings, nor what anybody else says or thinks, whether they like me or don't like me. I shall think only of my uncle.'

"There, uncle, that's what I said to myself, and I supplicate you, on my bended knees, to tell me if I have not behaved as I said I would?"

The orator paused, and felt the while a kind of little thrill at his heart, as though some other self had whispered to it—"Well done, Richard, you can speak! This is a natural gift. You had him there!"

Undoubtedly the speech had a kind of success. Its very directness and self-exposure tended powerfully to enforce its aim; and for once the alderman felt not only that his nephew had spoken to him in a truthful spirit, but had gone far to convince the alderman that he was not altogether acting rightly to Sleuth; not, at least, if he weighed only Sleuth's behavior. And as to secret dislikes and want of sympathy and so on, the alderman confessed to himself that his nephew had made out a better case for indulgent treatment than he had thought possible.

He turned about restlessly in bed, then rose a little, propped as usual by the high bank of pillows and Sleuth's careful hand, and, before saying anything, took a fresh draught of the cordial.

"Dick, that is the nearest approach to what I call manly behavior, on your part, that you have yet shown—cultivate it, Dick. And now to business. I very much fear my time is short. When Anthony comes, you mustn't wonder if I'm a bit taken up with him, seeing how the poor lad and I have been separated so long; I don't want you to think yourself badly treated. Open your mouth, then, and say what I can do for you."

"Oh, nothing more; nothing more, uncle! I must be covetous, indeed, if I were not satisfied with your generous, noble behavior and kind condescension—you finding me what I was——"

"Dick, what do you mean? What do you imagine I have done that you can thus speak of?"

"That's it, uncle," said Richard Sleuth, in affright, at noticing how near he had come to a confession that he had seen and read the codicil. "I do imagine of course, uncle, that when I come here you were as good as your word, and—and—provided for me, as you had previously provided for Anthony."

"You rascal!" chanted the now infuriated man, "you have been rummaging among my private papers. You have been tampering with that codicil in the safe!"

"Upon now, uncle, you speak of a codicil which you know very well cannot have seen. You have never yet once sent me to the safe, so how could I see it?"

"Did you? Tell me that."

"No—no—no, uncle. But you see, uncle, I knew you would not do, because it was what you had led me to think about."

"Very well. Let us mark my words, Dick. That codicil, which I don't deny I did draw up, I now retract. You hear me? I make no charge against you, Dick, with you; but that I claim to leave my property as I please. I don't consider because I tried an experiment with you, that I am bound to go on with the experiment. Rule, just the same as if the experiment had succeeded. You and I, Dick, are different. That can't be helped, I know your manhood in accepting the inevitable. Anthony will be my heir."

Carried on by his fell fierce will, the alderman had recklessly played with his little remaining strength in talking so much. But he did not like Sleuth's attitude, words or policy. Upon all he poised him, as revealing something beneath the softness, the weakness, the excessive amiability, which had been his daily torture of late. He hesitokened, if not strength, a quality akin to strength. The pigeon him and sensed in him. What! the pigeon turning against him! Then he must stamp harder.

He had lightly to repent his effort to speak. While he paused, stooping a little forward to lull some internal pain, he murmured, in a voice that hardly seemed to belong to the same man:

"Dick, the cordial! I—I'm exhaust—quick?"

But while Dick hurries so fast as to upset it with an excitation of greed, the alderman's head dropped on his breast, and hunge heavy and motionless.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear! what shall I do?" exclaims Richard Blunt, in a quandary of sympathy and hands. "Uncle! uncle! Dear uncle!"

The head still hung heavily, and Richard Sleuth's momentary sense, full of fear, more hardly characterized by their usual effectiveness. Instead of lifting the hapless head and supporting it, as his shocked yet unconsciousness might return, he lifted the whole of the upper part of the body, by a powerful grip around the waist, with the other hand at last, with some dangerous swaying of the senseless, gray-haired head, to lay the alderman back upon the pillows.

When the old man recovered his senses, the first fact of which he was conscious was that Sleuth had got a spoon between his lips, and was pouring down some of the cordial.

If the leopard could change his spots, now was the time for the latter fact to illustrate the operation with praxis. The alderman remembered how bitter had been his last words, and he was prepared with some huge like gratefulness, the character of his nephew's act as he received.

"Thanks, Dick, thanks! I thought it was all over. Blessed be God, I have got another brief space for doing the right thing. Dick, forgive it, if I spoke harshly. I intended to do right by you more. Heaven help me with health to do it now. There is trouble in my soul, which I want to remove by the act of justice at death. I mean Anthony to do it; then I got afraid, and tried you, Dick. But what I want isn't in your way, but now you are a friend—will a thousand pounds set you up comfortable in your own style, and enable us to part in peace?"

"You are very good, uncle—very," was Sleuth's only answer.

He was busy wiping away with a towel that portion of the cordial which he had been unable to take up with a spoon.

"But what do you say?"

"I shall always be grateful, uncle, to you for your goodness. I couldn't say more, could I?"

"Now, Sleuth, don't, there's a good fellow—don't excite—don't set me off again. I asked you a plain question. Give me a plain answer, and don't, as I said, excite do much good."

"Uncle, let Anthony have all, if you like; but let me have the beautiful satisfaction of serving you to the last, without hope of fee or reward, and of hearing you repeat—what you said before—you know my faith at all to find with me. Let me be rich in that, uncle."

"Then, you won't take the thousand pounds? Take time, Dick, to consider—take time. It may save you thinking very uncomfortably all your lifetime after. Now, Dick, do you take or do you refuse?"

"Uncle! I am but a worm in your sight, I know. I refuse? No, I consider it an alleviation of the ideal. I will do as I have done all along—obey you—do what you wish—be what you choose to have me."

There was a deep silence. The alderman was holding a terrible battle with himself; but he conquered, and said, with emotional calmness, considering the boiling, feverish blood that poured through his veins:

"Upon your peril?"

"Yes, uncle, if you say I must."

"Not a sibling! There, go! I have done with you," blurted out the alderman, and closed his eyes, that he might no longer see the unpleasant figure.

"No, uncle," said the nephew with increasing boldness, "I shall not leave you till cousin Anthony comes; he can't be very long. I told Phillis to say from me how ill you were; but don't be angry, uncle, I beg you not to be. I am young, and in health; and if, as you think, I have much mean sense and spirit, I'm still not afraid to get fun. I shall try to do as you did, uncle. Yes, I shall imitate you, and make my own way in the world."

The alderman stared again and again at his nephew, and felt he must give up the attempt to understand him. Yes, the alderman began to confess that Dick Sleuth, whom he thought he had known so well, was, after all, an inscrutable problem. He said no more.

CHAPTER VI.—VOICES OF THE NIGHT.

It is two hours after midnight, and the alderman's state gets more and more critical. Anthony has not yet come. He drinks incessantly of the cordial, and accepts hardly Richard Sleuth's aid, who bathes his forehead with vinegar and water, and seems to have forgotten as well as forgiven all his little disappointment, and to be more zealous than ever in his ministrations.

The alderman sleeps uneasily, cannot be grateful. He thinks he perceives only too plainly that Sleuth expects he will die before he can execute any new testamentary bold by the force of the last expiring effort of will. He passed at times in the middle of a sentence, knowing nothing of what he had been going to say, unable to finish it, read or understand what he had begun. But it was useless to hold, and before Sleuth could return.

He will now ring the bell and call the servants to witness what he has written, and he will ask them to stay with him, for he a afraid of his nephew of his, and wouldn't like to be alone with him when he shall know of this act. The bell—where is it? Sleuth has taken care to put it in the usual place. Half-maddened with the disappointment, he makes a superhuman effort to turn and reach the table where the bell stands. He has just managed to see its red dangling cover a-char utterly beyond his reach.

* * * * *

The alderman's fear is realized—he becomes unconscious. The strange medley of ideas jostle each other in his brain, and find voice through the blanched, burning lips. Debtors are vindictively pursuing him—bailiffs with executions—female errors in their passing; and the balance sheet for the year is looked out with a sort of agonized silence as to the character, and with a proof of over-much triumph in the words, "Next year say he a bad one." Then he is in a magistrate's chair, sentencing rogues and vagabonds with a kind of grim contentment with the work in which justice and a child are before him, and he is troubled—he knows not why. Then, again, a change, and he is railing his nephew Anthony for having handsomer clothes than those which she shows him, in which she is going to court. And so the mad dance of thoughts goes on.

Richard Sleuth is back again, and watching. He and the old man now are agreed in one thing—the alderman's fear of dying—what to do for the alderman, he resorts to the cordial. He is doing so now. Then he stops, and listens to the voices.

The alderman sleeps. He removes the bell-pull from the chair—a little nervously. He plays with it a moment or two, goes to the table on the other side of the room, and then he vigorously tugs at it. He thinks, no doubt, that the servants ought to hear the bell in the basement.

They come—first Phillis, then the housekeeper, then others—and stand gazing just within the door. The housekeeper, Phillis and Sleuth go to the open window and draw up the blind, which has been down. A west small fills the chamber—shows the new-grown hay in the alderman's paddock.

The, or some less palpable influence, soothes the alderman's nerves; he gives a soothier tone to his fancies. He begins to "babble of green fields," when suddenly there rises into the still sounds as of a note, clear and shrill, as if to call attention; and then it is followed by a series of trills, and a flood of sadness, that expires in sighs. It hastens one common notion, which the housekeeper expresses in a whisper to the gardener:

"It's only a nightingale."

The nightingale, on ceasing, calls up a blackbird; and the blackbird, on ceasing, calls up a cuckoo; and the auditory begin to wonder when can possess the birds, to be singing so as untimed an hour.

The bird notes cease, and a human whistle succeeds. It is clear, joyous and full of exuberant animal humor, as if in jest of the songs of the birds. In the very midst it breaks out into a repetition of the most prominent notes of the latter, as if the performer remembered that bit lovingly, and was obliged to come back to it.

Gerald—for it is Gerald who has thus asserted performance, which lasted some minutes, had become the alderman's will talk. He was now quite silent, and apparently asleep.

The performer, who was lying somewhere among the hay, now began a new tune—one unlike aught he had done before—simple, slow, pathetic melody, having somewhat of a foreign parentage in its expression.

Who was the alderman? He has risen—turned his half side towards the window, and now stares, a very image of rapt wonder. Those his eyes close, and before any one of those present can touch him to help him, as they fancy he needs, the aged man of the world—the irritable, hopeless, irreligious man is singing a verse of a child's song, in a foreign language, and the tune is the same that the vagrant Esau has just been whistling from his ravishing place in the field, and the song is the same Flemish song that the dead Jessy's little girl had taught him, sitting on his knee, in the counting-house of Rotterdam.

A CERTAIN dramatic translator, introducing a well-known comedian as Madame Warris, said:

"Madame, this is Mr. B——, who is not such a fool as he looks."

"True, madam," said the comedian, "and that is the great difference between me and my friend."

Punch asks if any man can receive a more aggravating condition than to see his creditor driving a pair of dun Poland.

NIGHT SCENE ON THE SATTLE FIELD.

BY J. R. SWETT.

'Twas night, the light of the day had flea—

Ah, well I remember how dismal it seemed,
As the moon shone down on the dying and dead—
How ghastly the glassy eyes glared upward,
Upturned, and catching the rays that shone,
Dimly and ghostly-like, down on the plain;
And the fitful nightwind, with a wild, wailing tone,
Was laden with many an utterance of pain;
The wail, dread and mournful, was borne by the air;
As rocked by the wind they tossed hither and fre

A woman walked over the field that night,
And paused, unheeding, each agonized cry.
Oh, say, can a woman be blind to the sight
Of those who are dying in misery, unnerved by?
Yes, when her eyes are but searching for one,
Who, perhaps somewhere in the ghastly throng,
She stopped at last, for her search was done,
And the shivering moon was hid by a cloud;
But the tall dark pines moaned more mournfully slow,
As rocked by the wind they tossed hither and fre.

The cloud passed by and the moon shone out,
And by its dim gleaming revealed a scene
Sad and true to the offering sent out
By Cegeber, shown in its glimmering sheen.
The woman was there, but she walked no more—
The lay of a corpse was the form of a woman;
And we saw by the moon that was glimmering o'er,
Her life from its burden of sorrow had fled.
The moon's dim light gleams walked mournfully slow,
As rocked by the wind they tossed hither and fre.

DURATION OF LIFE.

The average duration of life of man in civilized society is about thirty-three and a third years. This is called a generation, making three in a century and three hundred in a millennium. Only a small portion of people where this average is considerably exceeded. The commonest view from the cradle to the grave is the term of the artisan; the traveler than the sedentary the temperate than the self-indulgent; the just than the dishonest. "The wicked shall not live out half his days," is the announcement of Divinity. The philosophy of this is found in the fact that the moral character has a strong power over the physical; a power much greater than is usually imagined. The true man conducts himself in the light of daily precepts, is temperate in all things; is "slow to wrath," and "he that ruleth his spirit" is wiser than "he that taketh a city."

In these three claims are the great elements of human health: the restraint of the appetites; the control of the passions; the high-toned spirit of a pure character, "doing about using good."

Of the 1,000 persons named in Arthur philanthropist, Joseph John Gurney, that the labor and pains he took to live to a ripe old age were well repaid by the accomplished charities, so that some of them should live patiently beyond the age of one hundred; the labor of man, and he attended to his immense banking business and his charities up to his eighty-sixth year.

The average health of human life, of all countries, at the age of a month, is about 39 years. The expectancy of all who do not reach the age of seven; one-half die before reaching that age, and one-half of the life of "infants" in Great Britain and Ireland, is less, was exactly 2 years 7 months. Of the 1,000 persons of the people Gurney left a strong inducement for diligence and economy, and even model of life, which ever he was, that the longest lived of them reached considerably the means of so largely increasing the duration of human life.

Reasoning from the analogy of the animal creation, the human animal should live nearly a hundred years. It is now seeming to be, that life should be five times the length of the period of growth; at twenty-one years of maturity, if the longer persons are growing, the longer they should live, and the more vigorous they are.

A dog grows for 2 years, and lives 8.
A horse " 5 " " 25.
A horse " 6 " " 25.
A man " 21 " " 100.
A man " 20 " should live 100.

But the sad fact is, that only one man for every thousand reach the age of one hundred. Still all is not hopeless, but the science of life, as revealed by the investigations of the past few years, and the teachings of science in a real sense, is steadily extending the period of our actual existence.

The distinguished Dr. Hufeland, Monarchy, said a short while ago that in the 22 mid each year in 1800, out of 65 persons, only 1 died; in 1850 same term, but from 1870 to 1880 the duration of life in France increased 22 days and reached 30 years. Between 1800 and 1850 it was 40 years. The rich men in France live 42 years on an average, the poor only 26. Those who live "well-to-do-in-the world" live about 11 years longer than those who have to work from day to day for a living. Moreover, in their and the difficulties of the knowledge of the laws of life, and the means, and by temperance and thrift, are the great means of adding to human health and life, and to the enjoyment of existence. Such knowledge is only to be found in daily living, doing, and serving Him "who giveth us all things richly to enjoy."

CHANGE OF SCENE TO BEES.—A friend, who has been a beemaster for forty years, informs us that he has found a change of scene, especially from gardening to orchard, of great benefit to his bees. He added to orchard, of great benefit to his bees. He added that when carried into fields where buckwheat was in bloom from various distances, with which they learn high and low, and to the sunshine. In short, they see and fly, become boss of the world, and return to their hives with their pockets full of honey. The bees of a hive, after adding considerably to the stock of honey, and to the increase of young bees, to order of pleasants sense that have resided there for many years, and these birds are required, in order to keep the old bird in health, and in a state of vigor, they would breed annually. It is a common thing to have the swelling pens itself, and young ones know how expenses birds become much the worse for a year or two of confinement. But when the pens are made of light materials, and changed in situation every two years or so, birds remain comparatively healthy.

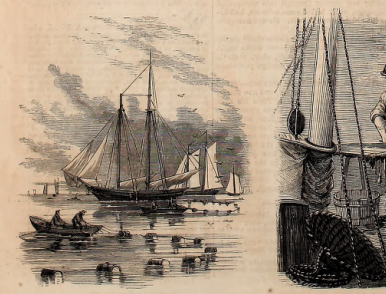
THE COD AND MACKEREL FISHERIES OF NEW ENGLAND.

We present this week a series of interesting views illustrative of the cod and mackerel fisheries of New England. Gloucester, Mass., which may be considered the principal depot for the fitting-out of vessels for the mackerel fisheries, is at this season of the year a scene of bustle and animation. Although the fleet now engaged is somewhat reduced from former years (the new vessels hardly amounting in number to the old ones sold), still it will comprise some 200 sail, and these vessels will in all probability average 100 barrels each if successful, which will amount to a total of 140,000 barrels. The cod-fisheries thus far this year have been very successful, and but few losses of vessels or men have occurred. In foreign commerce Gloucester still keeps her large Provincial trade, and several ships arrive every season from Liverpool laden with salt.

The vessels engaged in the mackerel trade are nearly all modeled alike, and are considered very fast. Although they are constructed almost exclusively with a view to speed and seaworthiness, the number of lives lost each year in roasting off the Banks of Newfoundland is astonishingly large. Our correspondent, speaking of the fisheries generally, gives an interesting account of the manner of baiting the hooks. He says: "The hooks being attached to a certain length of line, called a smood, they are carefully baited and placed one next the other, with the lines coiled, in oblong baskets, called trell baskets; after being so arranged, they are carried below deck and packed in ice, as fish will take no bait unless perfectly fresh. On arriving at the fishing grounds they are taken up and attached to a main line, or buoy line, at certain distances apart. This buoy line holds a number of buoys, in the shape of small kegs; to one end of this the anchor is attached, to prevent its drifting with the tide. A number of sets of these lines are anchored, and after remaining a certain period are taken up, by being placed across the "dory," or small boat. The fish being pulled in on one side and taken off, the hooks are baited afresh and passed over the opposite side of the boat. This explains the mode of catching.



"After the fish are taken on board they are thrown into large tanks on deck. By the side of these is placed a rough board table, fastened to the rail of the vessel, where the men employed in cleaning stands. Two men are generally allotted to this work, on board each boat, one working on each side of the vessel. The entrails of the fish are thrown away, with the exception of the livers, which are retained for the oil, which is so largely used in certain medicines. After being "split," the fish are carried between decks, salted, and put in casks. This proceeding is continued until the completion of the cargo, which usually averages from 80,000 to 60,000 fish.

"The crew now ship anchor and start for home. On arriving in port, the fish are landed, taken from the pickle, thence carried to the "flakes," where they are spread in the sun to dry until cured, the time varying according to the drying state of the atmosphere. They are then gathered up in small heaps and covered with boxes constructed for that purpose. Should the sun's rays become too hot through the day, which is often the case, and the fish would be in danger of becoming what is termed burned, then they are covered with a cotton spread. After the drawing has been fully completed, they are sent to the store-house to await shipment."

A FEW FACTS ABOUT CELEBRATED MEN.

Some literary men make good men of business. According to Pope, the principal object of Shakespeare in cultivating literature was to secure an honest independence. He succeeded so well in the accomplishment of this purpose that, as a contemporary early says, he had realized a sufficient competency to enable him to retire to his native town of Stratford-upon-Avon. Chaucer was in early life a soldier, and afterwards a commissioner of customs and inspector of woods and crown lands. Spenser was secretary to the Lord Deputy of Ireland, and is said to have been shrewd and sagacious in the management of affairs. Milton was secretary to the Council of State during the Commonwealth, and gave abundant evidence of his energy and usefulness in that office. Sir Isaac Newton was a most efficient Master of the Mint. Wordsworth was a distributor of stamps; and Sir Walter Scott a clerk to the Court of Sessions, both united a genius for poetry, with punctual and practical habits as men of business. Ricardo was no less distinguished as a sagacious banker than a lucid expounder of the principles of political economy. Grote, the most profound historian of Greece, is also a London banker; John Stuart Mill, not surpassed by any living thinker in profundity of speculation, has derived from the examining department in the East India Company the admiration of his colleagues for the rare ability with which he had conducted the business of he department.

Alexander Murray, the distinguished linguist, learned to write by scribbling his letters on an old wood-cast with the end of a burnt heather-stem. Professor Moor, when a young man, being too poor to purchase Newton's "Principia," borrowed the book, and copied the whole of it with his own hand. William Cobbett made himself master of English grammar when he was a private soldier on the pay of sixpence a day. The adze of his hearth, or that of his guard-bed, was his seat to study in, a bit of board lying on his leg was his writing-table, and the evening light of the fire his substitute for candle or oil. Even advanced age, in many interesting cases, has not proved fatal to literary success. Sir Henry Spelman was between 50 and 60 when he began his study of science. Franklin was 50 before he fully engaged in the researches in natural philosophy which have made his name immortal. Buonarotti was 56 when he entered upon his literary career, and Alfieri was 46 when he commenced the study of Greek. Dr. Arnold learned German at 40, for the sake of reading Niebuhr in the original. James Watt, at about the same age, while working at his trade of an instrument-maker at Glasgow, made himself acquainted with the French, German and Italian, in order to peruse the valuable works in those languages on mechanical philosophy. Handel was 48 before he published any of his great works.

Nor are the examples of rare occurrence in which apparently natural defects, in early life, have been overcome by a subsequent devotion to knowledge. Sir Isaac Newton, when at School, stood at the bottom of the lowermost form for one. Barrow, the great English divine and mathematician, when a boy at the Charterhouse School, was notorious for his idleness and indifference to study. Adam Smith, in his boyhood, was proclaimed by his father to be a grievous dunce. Even Dean Swift made a disastrous failure at the University. Sheridan was censured by his master to a fault for his dullness and inattention. Scott was a dull boy at his lessons, and while a student at the Edinburgh University received his commission. Professor Dalzell, the celebrated Greek scholar, said that "Dunce he was, and dunce he would remain." Chatterton was returned on his mother's hands as "a fool, of whom nothing could be made." Wilkinson never gave any indications of talent until he was brought into the field of practical effort, and was described by the strong-minded mother, who thought him little better than an idiot, as fit only to be "food for powder."

MANUFACTURE OF GLASS.

ALL writers on the subject of glass manufacture fail to show anything decisive upon the precise period of its invention. Some suppose it to have been known before the flood. Nervi traces its antiquity to the time of Job.

The first glass houses, well authenticated, were erected in the city of Tyre. Modern writers upon the subject generally refer to Pliny in establishing the fact that the Phœnicians were the inventors of the art of glass-making. The tradition is that the art was originally brought to light under the following circumstances. A vessel being driven by a storm to take shelter at the mouth of the river Belus, the crew were obliged to remain there some length of time. In the process of cooking, a fire was made upon the ground, wherein was abundance of the herb "kali." The plant burning to ashes, the saline properties became incorporated with the sand. The ensuing vitrification, the compound now called glass was the result. The fact becoming known, the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon essayed the work, and brought the new invention into practical use. This is the tradition, but modern science demonstrates the false philosophy. If not the incorrectness of Pliny's account, and modern manufactures will readily detect the error from the impossibility of melting silex and soda by the heat necessary for the ordinary boiling purposes.

THE FISH ON THE FLAKES.

It is a well-authenticated fact, however, that there were whole streets in Tyre entirely occupied by glass-works; and history makes no mention of any works of this character at an earlier period than the time mentioned by Pliny.

It was during the reign of Nero, so far as we can discover, that the first perfectly clear glass, resembling crystal, was manufactured. Pliny states that Nero, for two cups of ordinary size, with handles, gave 6,000 sesterces, equal in our currency to about £50,000; and that rich articles of glass were in such general use among the wealthy Romans as almost to supersede articles of gold and silver.

It is not strange that the strict secrecy with which the business was conducted in the middle ages should have invested the art with an air of romance; and legends, probably invented for the purpose, created a maximum of wonder among the uninitiated. The government of Venice also added, by its course, to the popular notions regarding the high mystery of the glass conferring, as it did, the title of "Gentlemen" on all who like in those days on all who became skilled in the manufacture. Howell, in his Londinopolis Letters, dated from Venice in 1619, says: "Here, without reason, it being a rank of mean degree and obscurity, it thinks best to hide itself bodies of dust and sand, for they are the only ingredients to such pellucid, dainty body as we never-eat glass is."

A French writer, who published an elaborate work upon the subject of glass manufacture, after it had been introduced into France, gives an interesting account of the rise and progress of the art in that country, the encouragement it received, and the high estimation in which it was held. After stating that it was introduced in France from Venice, he says:

"The workmen who are employed in this noble art are gentlemen, for they admit none but such. They have obtained many large privileges, the principal of which is to work themselves, without derogating from their nobility. Those who obtained these privileges first were gentlemen by birth; and their privileges running, that they may exercise this art without derogating from their nobility, as a surety of proof of it, which has been confirmed by all our kings, and in all inquiries that have been made into usurpers of nobility, never was any one attained who enjoyed these privileges, having always maintained their lustre down to their posterity."

Baron Von Loyben states, in his Analyses of Nobility as to Origins, that "no merit were the glass-makers at one period in Venice, and so considerable the revenue accruing to the republic from their manufactures, that, to encourage the men engaged in it to remain in Murano, the Senate made them all Patricians of Venice, and allowed nobles to marry their daughters; whereas, if a nobleman married the daughter of any other tradesman, the issue is not reputed noble."

THE TROUT.—This is the only fish that comes in and goes out of season with the deer, as grows in and goes out of season with the deer, as grows rapidly, and dies early after reaching full growth. The female spawns in October—at a different time from nearly all other fish—after which both male and female become lean, weak, and wholly unfit for eating, and if examined closely, will be found covered with a species of clove-shaped muscle, which appear to suck their substance from them, and they continue sick until warm weather, when they rub the insects off on the gravel, and immediately grow strong. The female is the best for the table. She may be known by her small head and deep body. Fish are always in season when their heads are so small as to be disproportioned to the size of their body. The trout is less oily and rich than the salmon, the female is much brighter and more beautiful than the male; they swim rapidly, and often leap, like the salmon, to a great height when ascending streams. In a trout-pond they may be fed with angle-worms, rose-bugs, crickets, grasshoppers, etc., which they attack with great voracity. They grow much more rapidly in ponds than in their native streams, from the fact that they are better fed and not compelled to exercise. Trout are the only fish known that possess a voice, which is perceived by pressing them, when they emit a murmuring sound, and tremble all over.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

Most heads diffuse less light than a pumkin shell with a tallow candle in it.

A man behind the times is apt to speak ill of them. Probably they don't look well from behind.

The men play cricket in the fields. A woman plays it by singing merrily at the hearthstone.

The passions are at least bold, generous, though destroying lions; egotism is a quiet, deep-biting, ever-sucking, venomous bug.

Man ought always to tremble in the presence of his highest happiness, as, also, to believe that there is a soft and gentle dew from heaven, that ever falls upon the stony earth.

A man who thinks properly is as serious at the thought of his birth as at his death.

There is nothing like tears for watering the flowers of joy.

"I shall be," and "I might have been!" The former is the music of youth, sweet as the sound of silver bells; the latter the plaint of age, the dirge of hope, the inscription for a tomb.

Ride as we will on the swift billow of to-day, we are never out of sight of yesterday.

The science that could teach men to forget, would be more welcome to many than all the trickery of mnemonics.

A vain man, like him who looks at the spectre of the Brocken, sees himself ten times as large as he is.

A schoolmaster recently illustrated his argument in favor of corporal punishment for children by a very pleasant piece of witticism. He said that "the child, once started on a course of evil conduct, was like a locomotive on the wrong track; it takes the switch to get it off."

DIFFERENCE OF OPINION.

Arabella: "Now, Charley, dear, do have a little courage; when I have a powder to take, I don't like it any better than you do; but I make up my mind to take it, and I do."

Charley: "And when I have a powder to take, I make up my mind that I won't take it; and I don't!"

A wag has truthfully said, that if some men could come out of their graves, and read the inscription on their tombstones, they would think they had got into the wrong grave!

A young lady addressing Mr. Legget, called him Limb-it; she considered it indelicate to say leg!

A magistrate asked a prisoner if he was married?

"No," replied the man.

"Then," rejoined his worship, amid peals of laughter, "it's a good thing for your wife!"

An Irish witness in a court of justice, being asked what kind of "ear-marks" the hog in question had, replied, "He had no particular ear-marks except a very short tail.

"That man is a thief," said a wag, pointing to a reporter in a court of justice.

"Why so?" inquired his friend.

"Why," cried he, "do you not see he is taking notes!"

A sceptic thinks it very extraordinary that an ass once talked like a man. Isn't it more extraordinary that thousands of men are continually talking like asses?

An amusing story is told of a young Parisian artist, who lately painted a portrait of a duchess, with which her friends were not satisfied, declaring that it was totally unlike. The painter, however, was convinced that he had succeeded admirably, and proposed that the question of resemblance, or no resemblance should be left to a little dog belonging the duchess, which was agreed to. Accordingly the picture was sent to the hotel of the lady the next day, and a large party assembled to witness the test. The dog was called in; and no sooner did he see the portrait than he sprang upon it, licked it all over, and showed every demonstration of the greatest joy. The triumph of the painter was complete; and all present insisted that the picture had been retouched during the night, which was actually so, the artist having rubbed it over with a thin coating of lard! The dog's nose was sharper than the critics' eyes.

"Represent me in my portrait," said a gentleman to his painter, "with a book in my hand and reading aloud. Paint my servant also, in a corner where he cannot be seen, but in such a manner that he may hear me when I call him."

The difficulty of acquiring our language which a foreigner must experience is illustrated by the following question: "Did you ever see a person pare an apple or a pear with a pair of scissors?"

A man boasting of the smartness of his child en said that the youngest was so smart that it would take its hand off a hot stove without being told.

We frequently hear of our generals capturing "pieces of artillery." What's the use of continually capturing pieces? Why not capture whole ones?

"You cruel man, my tears have no effect on you at all." "Well, drop them, dear."

A retired actor, with a fondness of poultry, was asked why he named a favorite hen "Macduff." He replied that was because he wanted her to "lay on."

A begging letter, lately addressed to the Emperor Napoleon, began "Sire, I received, under your late uncle, two mortal wounds—one at Wagram, the other in the leg."

An idle fellow, the other day complained bitterly of his hard lot, and said that he was born on the last day of the year, the last day of the month, and the last day of the week, and he had always been behind hand. He believed it would have been a hundred dollars in his pocket if he had not been born at all.

The story is told of an actor in London, that, fancying himself ill, he consulted a physician, but was told that nothing ailed him; that he only needed rest, recreation. The kind adviser concluded by recommending the patient to go and see Grimaldi. Alas, I am Grimaldi, was the reply of the hypochondriac.

A fascinating and lovely young lady, whose admirers were "legion," and whose name was Wood, was finally made a prize of by a fierce cavalry man named Steel. The deserted ones clubbed pens and brains, and after a week's fearful mental parturition produced the following epigram, which they entitled "Daphne Outdone:"

Pray tell us why the gods should dare
(Defying hence all human weal),
To change a nymph so passing fair
From yielding Wood to flinty Steel?

EUROPEAN POCKET TIME-KEEPER,

One Dollar Each.

(Patent applied for June 20th 1865.)

AN EXACT AND RELIABLE POCKET TIME-KEEPER for the poor man. A decidedly unique and sensible invention. Correctly constructed on the most approved scientific principles, and warranted to answer every purpose, with absolute accuracy and the utmost precision. More truthful than the most costly and elaborate Timepiece of modern manufacture. It never can be wrong. "It requires no key," or winding up. It never runs down, and can never be too fast or too slow. It is a most remarkable article. Just introduced into this country from Europe, where it is protected by "Royal Letters Patent." Price for a single one, with plain dial and White Bials, in Gold or Silver-Gilt Case, only $1. Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on receipt of price. All orders must be addressed to DEFALCATION OF THE PHOENIX BANK, NEW YORK.

THE Phœnix Bank defalcation, involving a probable loss to the bank of about $100,000, is now the theme of conversation in every financial circle in New York city. That such a stupendous fraud should be perpetrated on any carefully managed moneyed institution in the way the Phœnix bank was defrauded seems hardly credible, but that it should be done by a reckless, dissolute spendthrift seems beyond belief. None of the parties involved could have been considered other than suspicious characters—especially the pretty waiter-girl, Genevieve Brower, and the wonder is that the officers of the bank were not made aware of the habits of the teller months before he was detected in the commission of his crime. The defaulter, Henry B. Jenkins, had for twenty years held prominent positions in the bank, and at the time the fraud was committed was acting as assistant paying-teller. The other parties, John R. Earle, Miss Brower, and her paramour, Charles Brower, alias Bird, alias Brown, etc., who are alleged to be particeps criminis, were very obscure and entirely unknown before the detection of Jenkins, except in the immediate locality of their business—Brower excepted, who it appears had no business, or at least followed none.

On the morning after the arrest of the above parties, Earle, who had been employed in the Phœnix Bank, and who took $100,000 of the money embezzled by Jenkins and lost it in stock operations, committed suicide in his cell, in the 20th Precinct Station-House. Jenkins had, up to the time of his arrest, been regarded by his superior officers as an honest, upright, and perfectly trustworthy gentleman. It appears, however, that his honesty was sheer hypocrisy, and his uprightness a mere sham, for he made companions of the vilest of the vile of both sexes. During the examination at the Jefferson Market court, preliminary to the final committal for trial, all of the parties seemed imperturbable, and apparently indifferent as to the result. Our artist has given faithful portraits of Jenkins and Octavius Brower, and has carefully sketched the scene in the court on the day of the examination.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS OF FRANK LESLIE'S

NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold

OF Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American Ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have rendered our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This subscription is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an online engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

ANIMAL INTELLIGENCE.—Mr. Higgs, Mayor of Sudbury, relates: "I once had a dog which would pump water by taking the handle of the pump in its mouth, and working it backwards and forwards. The object was to get at the water in which they were put. Directly the dog saw the can and pump, he went, in which they were generally successful, and, getting hold of the latter, he would work the handle and wash away. Directly, however, the water began to flow, he would stop to have a few laps and drink. I have often seen him do this." Mentioning this fact among associates at Norwich, he was known driver of the omnibus between Walton and Felixstowe, he told me the following anecdote of the intelligence which he says he has often seen, and which anybody can see who chooses. "I was one day, at different parts of the town of Walton-on-the-Naze, and not appearing to have any business particularly to attend to, except the following mode of getting the owner of a horse or hackney-coach into debt. I had a pipe in my mouth and strolled the streets of the town. I then purchased a penny bun. She generally made it just in the middle of the town. I then broke the bun, and, taking out the sponge till her object in manufacturing it, I threw the sponge away. This was effected. In case of the horse, I threw the sponge in the direction of the bitch, and pussy pricks up the ears in a trice, and then off she scampers, throwing the bundle with her foot, and walks in. It generally is necessary to speak to the owner, and, to take any metaphysical disquisitions, that there existence of animal intelligence as not to be denied in the proper acceptation of the word. The horse and the cat have from experience learned that a certain act produced by reasoning brings to produce certain results, and they were both quick to avail themselves of means for their own advantage."

What is the average weight of a man? At what age does he attain his greatest weight? How much heavier are men than women? What would be the weight of 64 people—and what of every 64 people? M. Quetelet, of Brussels, undertook to solve these questions quite within the scope of his extensive series of researches on man. He got hold of everybody in reach, everywhere, and weighed them all. He weighed the babies, he weighed the children, he weighed the youths and maidens, he weighed the men and women, he weighed the old people, he weighed corpses, and, in short, he weighed everybody and everything he could find. He then took all these results and put them into a table. After a considerable period were weighed, and their weights were compared with those of the same number each sex taught in Paris and Moscow. The average result was that a child of 64 months, on an average day of his appearance in public, weighs about six pounds and a half; a boy baby a little more, a girl baby a little less. Some very modest infants barely turn the scale with two pounds and a half, while others pretentious youngsters bust at 10 and 12 pounds. M. Quetelet grouped thousands of people according to age, and found that the men of 20 averaged little each, while the girl a woman of 20 have an average of 120, while the girl a woman of 20 have an average of 120, His next reached their heaviest bulk at about 40, when their average weight was 154 pounds. They slowly fattened on until 60, when their average was 159, and then and seldom together, the weight at full growth averaged almost exactly 160 lb.

Morality in Murder.

Some very extraordinary phases of crime have lately been exhibited to the public as well as in this country. A certain Constance Kent murdered her young step-brother, and for five years permitted an innocent nurse to rest under the imputation of the crime. Then, under some unexplained impulse she confessed it, and that it was done "with great deliberation and cruelty." This, of course, seemed to her to death, but it is understood that confession is as good for the body safer for the soul, and that the sentence will be remitted.

Another remarkable case, and one calculated to raise some grave questions in connection with the differences in moral perception and responsibility, is that of a Swedish clergyman named Lindbach, who, thoroughly convinced of the hopeless and needless misery of some poor invalid parishioner, left his family, and under an apparent sense of duty, interfered to terminate their sufferings, and relieve their friends and the parish of a useless burden by poisoning them. He was lately found guilty of murdering some of the most miserable of his flock by mingling poison in the communion wine, and now stands on the motive which induced him to commit this horrible action seems to us to bear on it all the stamp of insanity, but the Swedish clergy apparently disputed. As far as we know his accusers only charged him with poisoning the unhappy creatures in order to relieve them of pone cares, a mild and comforting themselves in doing what they know, deep down in their hearts, to be wrong, by stating very explicitly to themselves that they were not ashamed of it, that they can speak of it in their prayers, confess it to themselves in their most solemn acts of thought, and, in short, act with regard to it as the guilt originating in an unselfish motive. But this is no doubt due to the returning health of mind caused by being rid of the burden of the sight and sense of misery and misery, and by having a private morality known to God and himself alone on the subject of murder, would be quite justified in keeping it to himself. Instead faith in the accuracy of his intellectual conclusions—a faith likely enough to disappear wherever the electric insulation of his thought was disturbed by human sympathies—sentiments of all around him on what he had done.

The most extraordinary feature in the frightful deceit put upon his own conscience by the Swedish murderer is, that he cheated himself into an atrocious crime without any apparent object of private gain. It is this which distinguishes his case from that of Riembauer, described in one of Mr. Senior's republished essays. Riembauer was a German priest of the highest reputation for integrity and piety, who was convicted for murdering his paramour. She had threatened to expose him and he set her threat in order to save the sanctity of his sacred profession. If she had been allowed to carry out her threat, "men would have less confidence in their clergy," in Riembauer's words, "and some might have thought religion a fable." He acted on a principle learnt from a casuistic teacher, that "honor is more valuable than life, and if it be lawful to protect one's life by destroying an assailant, it must obviously be lawful to use similar means to protect one's honor." Very much as the Swedish pastor admits his offence against the civil law, but maintains that God will approve the kindness of heart which dictated it, Riembauer said, "Her death has always been a source of great grief to me, though the motives which led me to effect it were praiseworthy."

Emigration in New York.

THE vast influx of migration to this country within the past few months is without a parallel in our history. Castle Garden, in New York, which for years has been so admirably managed by the Commissioners of Emigration, through their efficient agent, Mr. Bernard Casserley, may justly be considered the grand depot, at which most emigrants landing on our shores are received and provided for. So thoroughly systematized are the several departments of this noble institution that the chances for fraud upon the unsuspecting foreigners have nearly if not entirely vanished, and thieves, boarding-house runners and bagnage smashers have no longer a "profitable location or a name" in that locality. This circumstance has tended very materially to increase emigration, by affording a ready protection of person and safety of property being known to the laboring masses abroad, who seek passage to the United States. Since the opening of the new depot, the arrivals at Castle Garden will average weekly not less than 4,000, with a steady increase in favor of this season over that of any other period in former years.

Agricultural Fairs.

THE season is now at hand when our farmers are beginning to think of their fall fairs, and from every appearance the contests of our "sons of toil" in their several branches of industry, with agricultural and mechanical, will prove this year of more than usual interest. Thus far all over the country we hear of good crops and the most encouraging prospects for the harvest.

There will be on exhibition this year at the many fairs for the display of agricultural machinery and implements, the most perfect and beautiful specimens of the kind ever before made, and which will be in their turn as they are brought before the public. They have been faithfully said that a man lives wisely and beneficially for the world, who causes two blades of grass to grow where only one grew before; then the machine which saves us the crop with greater facility and security is of importance, and the improvements of which it is susceptible, and its better arrangements, are deserving of the closest attention. The harvesters and mowers are powers in the land.

"HERESIARCH," a writer who has achieved a great and not wholly undeserved reputation as a writer on Journalism in the United States, has put out with a new letter in behalf of Jeff. Davis. He does not wish to have the arch repudiator and chief rebel put on trial, as he says that it would be wrong to inflict capital punishment upon the innocent chiefs, because they were engaged, and in publicity, in civil war, and that according to Vattel they are therefore entitled to the treatment due to rebels, but of recognized foreign force. Very well, "Historicus" has appealed to Vattel, and to Vattel he shall go. In the very passage which he quotes from Vattel also that the rebellion "is applied only to such an insurrection against lawful authority as is void of all appearance of justice." Now that the present insurrection here was void of all appearance of justice, we have evidence which, whether it be received or not by the tribunals, is to the witness, or the position which he held in that insurrection, cannot be gainsaid. The proposition of the Grand Jury of Richmond of the late so-called Confederate States, speaking in the State Convention of Georgia, January 18, 1860, that "secession was revolution" is conclusive, and:

"What reason can you give to the nations of the earth to justify it? They will be the calm and deliberate judgment of the world that no such necessity can exist as can serve to paint out on which secession can be justified. Then, what is it? It is revolution!" What interpretation can be put upon the words? What interpretation ever denied? and what claim founded in fact, which Jefferson Davis withheld? One single reply since one Governmental act of wrong deliberately and perpetrated by the Confederate Congress at Richmond of which the South has a right to complain? I challenge the proposition and call for the production of such a Government as this, under which we have lived for more than one-quarter of a century, of which we have gained our wealth, our standing as a nation, our dominion, which has made us dominant of peril are around us, with peace and tranquility, accompanied with unbounded prosperity and rights unassailed, in the height of madness, folly and wickedness, to which it can neither lend any sanction nor any vote."

No man replied to Mr. Stephens then, no man has since then replied to him. Even he himself has never undertaken the task of bringing forward facts or reasons of any kind which could give that "appearance of justice" which Vattel insists upon as the condition of insurrection which is not rebellion.

THERE is a fearful looms plague in Syria. "The locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands," and they have descended upon the plain of Esdraelon and the neighboring country, consuming everything near and afar. A regular army, with pickets thrown forward, main body and rear guard. The Rev. J. Zeller, missionary at Nazareth gives a striking account of their advance on the nursery gardens round that beautiful village. The whole population turned out to resist them, and kept off the advanced guard by immense fires round the vineyards. But when the body of the army came up every effort failed —they fell like a flood upon the land, and not for many hours longer is it possible even to see from the roof of the houses by shutting every window and door. Every time a door opened to admit or let out any one, the locusts like a whirlwind rushed in of air, and at last they gave it up, and let the locusts have their way. So did the entire country, rooms swarm with the "do eaten" creatures. Every grass leaf is eaten up, milk and oil destroyed, and the only remaining provisions were corn and meat, which were very dear. The words of Exodus are literally fulfilled: "I will bring the locust unto thy coast; and they shall cover the face of the earth, that no one can be able to see the earth; and they shall eat the residue of that which is escaped, which remained unto you from the hail, and shall eat every tree which groweth for you out of the field; and they shall fill thy houses, and the houses of all thy servants."

THE following story is told of Lord Brougham. It happened when Lord Melbourne was Prime Minister. Brougham was in the act of quitting the House of Lords, when he saw Lord Melbourne ogle in the lobby. The latter was accompanied by two very pretty young ladies, and as he accosted the veteran statesman, philosopher and friend, he cried out, "What, Brougham, going already? Why there young ladies have come to be taken a speak." "I can't stay," quoth the Lord of Vaux; "then they shall." And with that he returned to the House, leaving his friend to entertain the ladies to the gallery. Lord Brougham took his seat, and waited his chance, which was not slow in arriving. A pause in the proceedings enabled him to rise, and ask a question of the Prime Minister with regard to a matter of foreign policy. Lord Melbourne was taken by surprise, but endeavored to ward off a surprise; he was non-plussed, and could only utter a few incoherent sentences, promising information at some future day. Upon this the Titan of debate, the Antæus of invective, arose and launched such a thunderbolt about the unpreparedness of the Ministry that the house was electrified, and every morning paper had a leader on the subject next day that seemed to attack you the Ministry. After this, Lord Brougham went house to his dinner, sufficiently rewarded for his had gratified the wishes of two young ladies.

IT was by the term "amber-colored" that Nero in his verses expressed the color of Poppæa's hair, from which we discover that that famous beauty was a blonde with auburn locks. Hair of this hue, therefore, became the fashion amongst the Roman ladies. Where false locks, generally from female savages of Germany, were imported, or their own black locks changed into red, just as in defiance to a powerful faction, the fair Roman women is transformed into that color by the use of a powerful alkali.

THE London Saturday Review tells us:

"The War of Independence will in future be to the people of the United States what the resistance of the richest school-days are to a man; the tremendous civil war is the time during which they virtually existed, and taken rank among countries that have had lives and have had a national being of their own. Of course, some sweet drink. The shades of hero and heroine are, we may hope, the spirits of worse of the old grudges along with them, but, on the whole, although it is a healthy thing that the civil war should be put out of slight only forgotten. In proportion to the severity of the trial, the gratitude to the successful issue should take a more sober tone; there will be the less room for boasting about a war of which the plain facts have been eloquent enough."

THE Paris correspondent of the London Globe says, another prototype for President Abraham Lincoln has been found in Servius Tullius, by the National Assembly in permanent session at Rome. Tullius was done to death by patrician daggers, for having raised the plebs to political importance, and for having manumitted the slaves. To put on record the views thus taken on the Tiber, the orator has embodied his notion in a lapidary inscription, which for greater local significance they have caused to be dug out in a fragment from the old tufa stone forming the ancient town boundary, Agger Servi Tulli, traces of which traverse the gardens of Sallust. This block they propose to transplant at Washington, in testimony of condolence with a free people, and the legend runs thus:

Abrum. Lincolnio.
Region. federate. American. Presid.
Hostis. ut. Servi. Tulli. Agger. lapid. in.
Quo. utrisque. vin.
Libertati. asserter. fortissim.

EMIGRATION en masse to this country in contemplated by the 18,000 Polish refugees now dispersed among the Swiss cantons, and they are to active communications with Washington. Zaluski, their delegate, Nowikolski, about the terms on which they would be received as agricultural laborers in the states. The Helvetic Diet has already voted a subsidy to each emigrant of 108 francs, and it is expected that the French government will place some of its transport ships at their disposal for conveyance to their place of destiny.

IN the late English elections, the aggregate Liberal vote was 194,628, the aggregate Tory vote 178,727; Liberal majority, 16,157. When we consider the only about one in seven of the intelligent men of Great Britain have the right of suffrage, it must be considered that democratic ideas are making pretty rapid advancement in the kingdom.

THE London Times, which proclaimed the United States hopelessly bankrupt before the close of the first year of the war, sings now to this tune: "We do not suppose that the debt of the United States, great as it is, will crush the energies of the American people. They have overcome greater difficulties, and are not likely to be deterred by the less."

TOWN COSSIP.

DEFALCATION is the order of the day. It was either formate or unfortunate, as the case may be, that the defaulting cashier of the Ætna so completely cuts the bank-clerk Jenkins, although the Delilah who ruined the former was a confidential clerk, and the pretty fiend of a subterranean saloon. Still, the infatuation was equally fatal, and we are asked to be his temptress, but the other his nemesis. One great and suspicious fact, however, glares out of this hideous mental and moral ruin, and which is the suspicious carelessness and credulity of men whom we have hitherto been taught to look upon as the very suspicious and models of morals. In the case of the bank-clerk we have the Arcadian spectacle of bank directors and chief cashiers of banks signing their deed of a subordinate for such immense sums of money, that unbeknownst almost to themselves and very nearly unconsciously, are taken to the specially statutories of villainy! In the other, we have a porter's clerk, who, with a small and sufficiently large forged gold cheques so clumsily manufactured, that there was no effort made to disturb the banker's confidence in his customer, and who was very nearly even again successfully in several instances. Indeed, it would seem as if the bankers had a mania for not seeing one of the bobbies precisely taking a friend that they had just arrested for pocket-picking, and that the cheque was shown to him the merchant at once pronounced it a forgery. The brick that loosened the whole fabric was a cheque for a small sum of money, which has stolen with intent to "do cashee." That the defaulter will be punished is quite probable more careful we do not believe; it will be a nine days' wonder, in the Shylock parlance, and then be overwhelmed in the past, and will fall down with blinded eyes at least, until some new revelation of rascality comes from again, and against the wall of which the public are now making mercantile curatives, and will be as speedily passed over, and not worth the trouble of a thought. It is a useless enterprise to try a few casualties stop the great battle of Guise and Gold. Like the fall of a general in action, he is carried off the field, and the battle continues as before. But, despite the philosophy of speculation, the present unsatisfactory state of affairs cause the pulse quicken to check out of our right.

THE Fire Commissioners this week, another instance of the cruelty of sparing the life of a murderer. To that wicked tenderness shown by the public authorities in commuting the sentence of the murderer Barrett, of this city, while rescuing a woman from outrage, hindered by one of those unaccountable sympathies that so often overpocket life and property from the privileged class of ruffians, Lynch law must, decidedly even in the case of Barrett, be resorted to. Better that the naturals of blood and violence to which we seem to be fast drifting, than what does not seem to be a high civilization to protect the judges?

THE agency of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable has been a source of great regret to every one, although to a certain extent there was a half expectation that such would be the case. Had the cable been a success, there was not as well made as the old one, and it is pretty certain that the second laying of the cable would not long have been maintained. The lesson or both failures cannot be lost on the Old World, and even to be, that if the cable is without a flaw it can be laid, always providing that proper care is used in the operation. On the second occasion of the failure of the cable was not as well made as in regard to have been, as the strain was greater, and the difficulty arose in the chafing of the cable against the side of the Great Eastern, which shows either carelessness or want of skill, each equally fatal to the success of the undertaking. An official in the British service, in a letter to the London Times, suggests that a cable be laid to the Azores which has just happened, and declared that the cable is feasible to be laid from there to the North American side. We may also add that the cable should be manufactured by Anne-man, laid by Americans, owned by Americans, and worked by Americans, a company which can be done easily when the Fenians take Ireland.

AMONG literary curiosities there appears a very interesting and valuable books; one called "Our Farm of Four Acres," and the other, "Our Six Acres Enough, and Where to Find It." We do not know where so much pleasant agricultural reading is to be found as in these two volumes, which are the result of a series of some ancient lecturers, either Lecian or Artemus Ward, and how every agriculturist can be made happy if his husbands can nurse to their wives, and the brothers to get married. We may spoil the sale of these books by saying that we have farms will like them, and those who have't farms will go at once and invest in them.

A new sensation has broken out at the park. The curators to the grass plots have become enraged thrown off their coolness the past week, by the constant appearance over their heads of a gigantic, globe shaped balloon, which sails over the park under its close direction. Some asserted it to be a new moon, as yet undiscovered by astronomers, a comet, a meteor, or one of the latest Wall streets bubbles. The matter could not long remain unexplained to curious eyes, and the result was the discovery of, not the famous war elephant Hannibal as the show bills have it, but the famous war balloon, which has been constructed under the pilotage of Professor T. S. C. Lowe, who has established himself in the corner of the Avenue and Fifth street, the tiny ground of the 5th avenue shading pedestrians from the scorching sunbeams, and the trees in front, and fora small douceur elevates the corporeal body 1,000 feet above the earth, giving the eyes such a sight of New York and its environs as they never had before had. Five minutes in the clouds, with the thermometer at a comfortable degree, soon be forgotten, and something that will only be missed by those who are not to all occasions.

The lovers of opera are discussing the new engagements made by s. s. talented tenorino, many of his new bride being unknown to the musical world. According to the enlightened favor of a daily paper, novelty would be benefited from the world of art, and solely linked reputations would monopolize the stage till the reward the age of Methuselah. Paris, Grisi, Mallibran, Jenny Lind and Mario at one time were unknown. The sapient critic himself who has made this wonderful discovery at one time had never written, and was consequently unknown. At all events, no impresario can have upon a New York audience either stingers or silver with their merit it undoubted.

There is nothing new at the theatres, except at the Winter Garden, where Barnum provides a change of performances every week.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic—A correspondent of the Illinois State Journal, who has traveled through the central portions of that State, says the wheat is not injured to exceed 20 per cent; oats are damaged but little, barley about 20 per cent; while corn is improved fully 25 per cent, by the late heavy rains. He thinks the corn-crop will be immense.

The present mayor of Jerusalem, Florida, was elected by a majority of one vote. The result has been contested by the highest judicial authority of the nation. This is the first instance in the state in Florida where the negroes have participated in an election.

The "Flag Uplifted and other sermons," who once preached in the Church of the Puritans, in Baltimore, says a correspondent of the New York Commercial Advertiser, is now in Richmond, has joined the rebels, others went in a body, and the whole congregation, it is said, have recently gone over.

Diphtheria is a very troublesome and dangerous disease. A simple remedy has been found for it that will effect a speedy cure. Take a common tin quart measure, put a little in the bowl, drop a little hot spirits on coal, then set a tube into the mouth, and the disease is broken up.

An effort is on foot to make Lafayette, Indiana, the permanent capital of that State. The scheme is to tap the Uppermost River about 10 miles from that city, and thence by a canal to the Wabash, sufficiently large to navigate for boats, and form what power is wanted for the State Capitol, and the Legislature.

"The Poor Man's Savings" is the new name for the Freedman's Savings Bank.

The income of the Girard estate, in Philadelphia, for the year ending the 1st of January, 1865, and to the 1st of January, 1866, there were 445 pupils in the Girard College, and on the 1st of January, 1866, only 47 vacancies existed.

The total sales of the Union Hotel at Saratoga entertained 1,400 people, who consumed 1,240 pounds of beefsteak, exclusive of other meats, and 400 quarts of milk.

The Postmaster-General, in re-establishing the mails with the South, has given the contracts on the old terms, which were often most extravagant. During the war, the mails were carried in carts, and sometimes on a horse effort will be made to keep it so.

A correspondent of the "Sunday Mercury," says a correspondent, "express great indignation if asked if they have church in Richmond. They have enough for master and we, I spec we can raise 'sufficient for 'em." Many of the churches, which have been converted into stables, will be restored to their original purpose.

It is almost whether they could be trusted to vote, they are so ignorant. Of the 1,000 votes in the vote, but one ring is there, we can't trust in white men, for they are all rebels, cause they are afraid to cheat us out of our rights."

The Paris Constitutionnel says that there are 21 establishments in the United States for the manufacture of arms, which employ 24,724,794, and workmen, who annually manufactured valued at $4,417,500. The number of fire-arms manufactured in the year 1864 was 2,771 females, to whom are paid $1,504,420. The value of the fire-arms manufactured is given at $7,607,525.

A correspondent of the Newark (N. J.) Advertiser, describing the season at Lake George, says that at one of the hotels there is a grand piano in front of the office. So anxious to an inquiry, one of them replied that, out of the forty boarders there, only one lady knew how to play, could read, and, with one exception, all could write. Of the forty, only one knew of a white reverend, but he lived in Saratoga or New York equally intelligent and well-informed.

Speaking of the late election in Kentucky, the Louisville Journal says: "We have for some time been urging, not wholly without success, to convince our friends that the number of rebel rebels is not to be being reconciled ones since the close of the war; but in view of the fact that the vote cast at the election in some parts of Kentucky, we are apprehensive that we have underrated the number. Many of the men who fought, or rather most audacious, of all the rebels, are now found to be Union men. They have elected to the Legislature by large majorities, and in one or two districts have even elected rebels but for the reason that they are so.

—A rich foreign parvenu, a few days back, paraded the Champs Elysées in Paris, driving four grays by six horses. Greatly to his astonishment, he was waited on by a police officer, who told him that in France no one was allowed to use more than two horses. He was complained that he could not have so many animals in his carriage, and that he was informed that if he again were fond himself with six horses, the animals would be taken from him. Such is the law, and it must be carried.

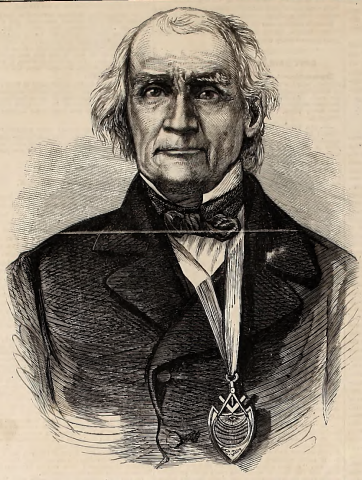
MOUNT HEGLA.



THE eruptions of this volcano have been discontinued since 1845. The last black-lead country appears in its cadence. There have been intervals of 74, 79 and 77 years between previous eruptions, and it is stated that the ordinary term of its could expect to do so without bearing more than once that period. The last eruption was in labor. In 1300 the annalists assert that Hecla was rent in its spongy from top to bottom—and no doubt it was very much so. Since the awful gash, now marked by a deep ravine, was partially healed by the eclipses of the rock and the falling of the snow, and during the eruption in 1693, Sir Joseph Banks states that scales were carried to a distance of 30 miles, that the cattle in the neighborhood were either choked by the noisome vapors or starved to death on account of the ashes which covered all the over-spread, they were discovered to be full of volcanic dust.

Besides Hecla, however, there are many burning mountains in Iceland, in which are to be found lakes of a still more rubidescent part. From Krabla a stream of lava was ejected between the years 1724 and 1729, and rushed into the lake Myvatn, where it filled the bed, which is now a plain, and the water, which is still a fine theme for several days. But under is no rock in Iceland, which is not volcanic. Mount Hecla is 5,000 feet high. Skaptar is a mountain in the south of Iceland, which is 6,000 feet high, and is part of a cluster of mountains which seem to lay their heads together in the sky. It is a huge crystal spheroid, inaccessible to human foot. From an account published in the Copenhagen Gazette we learn that the last eruption occurred to hold an inquest, as it were, over the disease of Mount Hecla, and therefore has been taken some exaggeration, it appears that throughout the eyrie, or nest of mountains, the most terrific scenes were presented. The eruption began on the 15th of June, which the ground for many days previously to day, and were heard in forests many miles distant.

Columns of pillars or smoke were seen to shoot up from the crater, and from the midst of the smoke was black in the air, from which sand and ashes fell in profusion. By night the sky was lighted with flame, and the ground in the neighborhood covered to the depth of 12 inches. Many of the cattle perished because the grass were thus burnt. The sounds were like the thunder of the loudest cannon. Fiery whirlwinds of the darkness in affright, and plucked their tents in the open fields. On the 17th, 18th and 19th the eruption was at its height, and to the south, and then a torrent of glowing lava burst from the western side, forming a mountain 400 feet high which the river ran, though its course was changed, and the water was forced to wade a mile further out than before. Huge rocks were thrown into the air, and fell with incredible velocity. Sweeping along the ground with awful rapidity, they crushed everything in their way, and many farms and buildings were consequently submerged. The lava, as it cooled, fell down the river bed, and the water, which was at first boiling, soon became cool enough for fish to live in it. The lava, as it passed at a short distance, but on the 21st of June, the eruption had ceased, and the lava, which had burst from the usual outlet, stanched the church and village, and soon after the lava ceased flowing, the water began with violence over the drowned hamlet. In the attempt to escape from the flood, many people were lost, but in some chances, rolling on its covering of snow as if it were a sheet, and so safely landed by torrent.

Numerous eruptions from the volcano, between the years 1766 and 1845, but they did not fall down in force with such material, and as the other effusions were now and then accompanied by earthquakes, the fear of the natives was greatly increased. Many of the more currents were seen rolling down the mountain sides, and the lava, as it cooled, assumes of 60 feet. The sheets which the space of a single evening.

Continuing to flow until the end of August, the smoke locked up some fiery gases, drove the inhabitants from others, and spread destruction wherever he appeared. For several years afterwards the vapor still rose from particular spots, as if the fury of the microbe were even unsatisfied. It was not until February, 1856, after ejecting a prodigious quantity of lava, from its entrails, a gradual perhaps that ever issued from the volcano before, that the mountain returned to its ordinary condition.

THE LATE JOHN HUTCHINGS, PILOT OF THE FIRST STEAMER BUILT BY JOHN FITCH.—FROM A DAGUERREOTYPE.

THE LATE SIR E. P. TACHE, PREMIER OF THE CANADIAN PARLIAMENT.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY SMEATON.

JOHN HUTCHINGS,

The First Steamboat Pilot.

One by one of the aged men whose lives have served to make the history of our country are passing away, and soon there will be nothing left to but the prized record of their deeds, and the cherished remembrances of their personal virtues. Mr. John Hutchings, of Williamsburg, L. I (Brooklyn, E. D.), died at his residence on the 24th ult., in the 84th year of his age. He was a man the community could ill afford to lose. His blameless life and extensive knowledge of events of the greatest moment in our history which transpired under his observation, made him one whose acquaintance and friendship was prized by all.

Mr. Hutchings was of English descent; was born in Northeastle Westchester County, New York, in the year 1781, and received an ordinary school education in his native town. His parents removed to New York before he was 16 years of age, where, while yet a mere boy, we find him assisting the inventor, John Fitch, in his experiments in applying the propulsive power of steam to boats. These experiments were made on the old Collect Pond, which lay where the "Tombs" now stands. He acted as fireman on the first vessel built by Mr. Fitch, and consequently may be termed the oldest steamboat pilot in this country. Having the entire confidence of the inventor, he was familiar with his plans and designs, and has always contended for the priority of John Fitch's claim to the great honor of introducing the use of steam as a propelling power for boats, over that of Robert Fulton. In 1846 Mr. Hutchings published the well-known chart, representing the Collect Pond and vicinity, as it formerly appeared. The work contained a pictorial illustration of the first boat and his machinery. He also published a fac-simile of the original account kept by George Washington with the United States, from 1775 to 1783, which was very widely circulated.

Mr. Hutchings had a mind full of enterprise, and was engaged in various pursuits during his life, but mainly in the cooperage business. He was a zealous member of the Order of F. & A. M., and was chaplain of Hyatt Lodge, No. 205. Mr. Hutchings was always much interested in the education of the young, and labored zealously to establish a system of public schools. This patriarch, so loved and honored by all who knew him, was buried with Masonic honors, on the 28th ult., in the cemetery of Evergreens, Brooklyn, L. I.

ST. JOHN'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH, CHURCH HILL, RICHMOND, VA.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. J. RECKER.

REV. S. H. TYNG, JR., RECTOR OF THE CHURCH OF HOLY TRINITY, NEW YORK CITY.

REV. STEPHEN H. TYNG, JR.

We present this week a portrait of the Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, Jr., son of the distinguished rector of St. George's Church, New York. The subject of our sketch was born in Philadelphia, June 30th, 1839; graduated at Williams' College, Mass., in 1858, and would have finished his theological course in the seminary in Fairfax County, Va., had not the opening war obliged him to leave that State. For sometime he held the position of chaplain of the 12th Regiment N. Y. S. M., and accompanied that gallant regiment to Harrisburg when called to the defence of Pennsylvania. In person Dr. Tyng is of the average height, full face, genial expression and commanding mien. He has a quick, nervous temperament, is decidedly able for his years, and is exceedingly zealous in his Christian work. He evidently takes for his models men of the stamp of his father, and desires to establish a fame based on substantial acquirements rather than sensational accomplishments. Dr. Tyng is now the rector of the Holy Trinity Church, Madison avenue, New York, a sketch of which we give in the present issue.

A CANDIDATE at an election, who lacked eloquence, when another had, in a long and brilliant speech, promised great things, set up and said: "Electors of G——, all that he has said I will do."

THE CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY, MADISON AVENUE, CORNER OF FORTY-SECOND STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

THE PRESENT CONDITION OF THE NEW IRON BRIDGE, HARLEM, N. Y.

FOR BETTER FOR WORSE.

THE orange blossoms wreathe my brow,
My finger wears the bridal token,
The holy rite hath all been said,
The binding words have all been spoken;
While life endures, till death us part
Thro' joy and sorrow, good and ill,
I'll bear thy image in my heart—
I'll cling to love—obey thee still;
My hopes all centre now in thee,
And henceforth thou my fate wilt be.

Think not I speak with doubting heart,
Or turn regretful to the past;
Deeming these early joyous days
Too glad, too bright to last.
Ah, no! I know thee all too well,
Too earnest is my faith in thee,
I would but show thee what thou art,
The very light of life to me.
Earth has no happier fate beside
For me than this—to be thy bride.

And it is mine; I am thy own,
Forever thine, whate'er betide,
From all life's griefs, in all life's cares,
Thy love my shield, thy truth my guide,
I have no hope, I have no thought,
I have no wish thou dost not share,
My being is wrapped up in thine,
Thy name is in my every prayer;
Thy own true heart, thy faithful breast,
My home, my refuge and my rest.

Cad's Correspondence.

BY F. PALMER.

HALF-A-DOZEN young fellows, junior officers of the gunboat Broadside, were lounging wearisomely about their mess-room one winter evening during the rebellion, seeking to dissipate their low spirits in clouds of smoke and occasional volleys of imprecations at the stupidity of service on the blockade, at their late ill-luck in prizes, at the weather, the fare, and such other items as go to make make up the sum of masculine infelicity.

"Nothing to eat!" "Nothing to chase!" "Nothing to do!" were the peevish ejaculations that came successively through moustaches bristly and silky, black and brown.

"Not even a mail!" was one's inconie lament.

"No; no letters for a fortnight!" came discon-solately in response.

"Nobody, for my part, to write coy," added Lieutenant Lyle, in a tone of philosophic dejection.

"Nor I—except my governor, who sends me a foolscap of advice once in a while, or some old friend, who considerately recalls himself and his little debt to my recollection, now that I am serving Uncle Sam, and, consequently 'flush!'"

Just then one of the party, wearing an Assistant-Surgeon's insignia, was twisting a wisp of paper with which to light a fresh cigar. Something upon it seemed to engage his attention.

"Boys," said he, in a moment, "on the principle that the devil's always near when you're talking about him, here's a suggestion of a remedy for ennui. Listen, ye disconsolate, it's better than most of my prescriptions."

And Dr. Breck read:

"Two young ladies, of loveless leisure, wish to correspond with any number of young gentlemen. Sincerity no object."

"Oh, that's stale trumpery, doctor. Give us something new, if you are going to prescribe," said one.

"Yes, I should think so," sneered Langdon Lyle, who was a New Yorker, and had been at Paris and Vienna, and sincerely thought himself blasé at twenty-five. "Of all despicable modes of entertainment, these anonymous correspondences seem to me the most insane. As if any women, with whom one would deign to flirt, if acquainted, would waste her stationery and sentiment in such a way!"

"Don't,he too disdainful," said Dr. Breck; "I've seen some fun result from these things."

The doctor was authority in adventures, a gay-hearted, popular fellow withal, so the majority listened favorably.

"Well, come on, doctor, and tell us the way," said one. "Fun's what we want."

"Now, for instance," said Breck, leaning back, with half-closed eyes, and speaking between whiles, "if we should insert, jointly, as a advertisement for a correspondent, in FRANK LESLIE'S ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER say, and then divide the replies before opening them, why some of us might——"

"Yes, yes!" chorused the desperate group.

"It's a good idea, after all, and, at any rate, would give us something to expect beside eight bells and salt beef."

"And such beef!" said Lyle, meditatively.

So the pocket edition of "Les Miserables" spent the long December evening in concocting an advertisement. It was written and rewritten, quarrelled over, put to vote, and really proved in itself quite a fruitful source of diversion to all but Lieutenant Lyle, who emphatically declared he "would none of it," and resolutely sulked away the hours in supreme contempt at the interest his mess-mates exhibited in the matter.

But the advertisement was dispatched, and in due time appeared in print, and in time also wee rewarded by a flock of missives in reply, as if St. Valentine had suddenly assumed the patronage of the Broadside.

LIEUTENANT LYLE'S INTERVIEW WITH "MISS RAVELYEA."

LIEUTENANT LYLE READING CAD'S LETTERS.

To Dr. Breck, as instigator of the scheme, fell, of course, the privilege of portioning these replies among the expectants.

"Come, Lyle," he said, coaxingly, "take your share," and he tossed towards the Lieutenant a long, narrow, cream laid envelope, stamped with a crest.

The recipient had not been wholly proof against the contagion of excitement; perhaps, also, a slight taint of constitutional curiosity (inherited from his mother) prompted concession. He turned the letter a few times rather contemptuously in his fingers, and at length broke the seal.

Dr. Breck watched him with wicked eyes.

He read the contents rather carefully, in spite of his supercilious smile, and really they seem addled accention. It was indisputably a brilliant letter which had fallen to his share.

"Rather—that is, a trifle—strong-minded," he thought, during his second perusal; "but written so clearly and daintily."

He was sure the writer had pretty taper fingers, and had written with a jewel-tipped gold pointe. He fell to considering the surroundings under which the pages were probably penned, ranked a lace-draped bow window, or a rose-aimed boudoir, an inlaid desk, a spray of heliotrope in a glass close side it. And then the face, violet eyes, probably, and not much color.

"Though," he ruminated, coming down from his reverie to the smoke-filled room, the red-hot stove, the odious carpet pattern, and the distorted eagle on the baby spread.

"I say, boys," he cried out, "the owner of a pretty woman would back us to, eh?"

"We'll have their curios de viste next time," responded some one, in an absent-minded tone, without looking up from the purple-inked pages of his epistle.

"Decidedly," thought Lyle, "for a woman. It has but one fault: there's a trifle too much of the sexual sometimes in the style," and he found himself sighing hopes upon the author.

Regularly the exchange went on, and with time the one fault he had noticed gradually disappeared. The signature changed from "respectfully, Josephine Rapelye," to "your friend, Cad." The slightest perceptible tone of confident dependence, the somewhat lofty strain of the earlier letters, even deepening, as the months were away, into a half tenderness, but, as though unconsciously, or against the writer's will. These letters were, maybe, less brilliant than the first, but certainly they satisfied Lieutenant Lyle's preconceived, a good deal better. Yet even to himself he would hardly admit his interest in them.

"Well, Lyle," Dr. Breck would sometimes say, in a jeering, quizzical way, "has it got as far as the Platonic, yet?"

At which Lyle invariably frowned in silence. And when the others begged that he would show his assignment letters, as they did theirs, and declared that ignorance was unfair, he frowned in silence again. Then Dr. Breck said, a little exultantly, it seemed that the case was serious and must not be let alone. It was to ruin, however, that Langdon solicited a picture of his incognita.

"Impossible! impossible!" was the only reply.

Also when spring approached and he conceived hopes of a "leave," he wrote to ask if he might not visit "Miss Rapelye?" but the lady's arch and sensible reply was "you remember that our 'only object' was a correspondent, not an acquaintance."

"But you have signed yourself 'my friend' for you have yourself abandoned the ground of being merely my correspondent," wrote the logical Lyle, to which the lady with total renunciation alike of grounds and arguments, responded:

"I'm afraid you'd better not come."

This, though, was not discouraging. Having Miss Rapelye's address, Lyle believed he should easily discover the true name of his correspondent, when, by-and-by, he had become sufficiently interested, which gave zest to his anticipation of going home.

Early in April Dr. Breck and he received, each, his leave of absence, and sailed together for New York.

There, at home, Langdon dallied for ten of these swift twenty days, which are golden grains in the glass of many a destiny, and then one morning, under a vague impulse, took a train on the Hudson River road, and in less than a couple of hours had reached "Miss Rapelye's" dale, and his own destination.

Lounging upon the hotel piazza, waiting for something to turn up, he beheld Dr. Breck. They were mutually astonished.

"What on earth are you doing here?" demanded Lyle, with a vague uneasiness and sense of "being caught."

"Why, I'm at home; but what are you doing?"

Langdon was in position. He might confess a lie, take the next train out, and give up the quest and the correspondence, and let the whole thing drop where it was.

But he didn't want to!

So he took the darker into his confidence. He was just the one to help him, and there was no use being "escapish" about it.

"Breck," said he, "that girl I've been corresponding with lives here, and I'm bound to find her. Will you help me?"

A puzzling expression came across the doctor's face; a look of reflection of Langdon's at their meeting.

"Why," said he, rather slowly, "I'll do what I can."

Just then a group of school girls went by, on the opposite side of the way, too vitalized and festive glances at their uniforms, brilliant in the morning sunshine, on the hotel stoop.

Lyle's eyes accidentally followed them.

"There," said he, "I wish that were she—the one in the little black hat; I like her looks."

Breck turned.

"Why that's—that's—that's—" but he did not conclude the sentence, and began asking his perplexed friend some irrelevant questions, and shortly excused himself, saying he would come back in an hour and report progress.

Langdon wondered what made the doctor so glum.

"I say, Breck," he called after him, "you were the instigator of the frolic, and I'll think you're mean if you don't help me out."

Breck's look was that of a mixed sense.

"You'll hear from me," he said, hastily.

He believe he knows who it is," thought Lieutenant Lyle, as he paced the piazza, thinking of various things; of some of his correspondent's confessions, of his gainsay little face, how much had gone by, and of it's pretty wearer, until a hey bandied him note.

He hadn't really put rather fast as he looked at it. The writing was not "Cad's," but it ran:

"I learn, through Dr. Breck, that you are in town, and wish to see me. You may call at the corner of Willow and Elm streets, and ask for Miss Rapelye."

Lieutenant Lyle repaired to his room and consulted his mirror. He was really a handsome fellow, and his gold banded sleeves, unbuttoned buttons, and tasteful cap were certainly prepossessing. He felt in good humor for an adventure.

On the corner of Willow and Elm streets he knocked at the door of a substantial brick cottage, and asked for "Miss Rapelye," as directed. He gave the servant his card—"Langdon Lyle, U. S. N."—and was shown into the parlor.

Just from the hooded hall he conjectured, but still a cozy and tasteful room. Tinges were piles of books, some engravings, a hand-organ—small but promising. Yi Yore—an open piano, new music and masses of delicate, flaky, early flowers in various receivers. The mid-April air came through an open window, and a clear fire burned in the grate.

Langdon felt a sense of an exquisite presence. The door opened, and he rose to greet his incognita.

"Miss Rapelye?" he advanced—faltered and finally held out his hand, bowing low to conceal the shame he sought in vain to hide. The sight of a tall, ungraceful woman who wore her hair in a knob, glasses, and a check apron.

"Lieutenant Lyle," she said, pleasantly but rather shrilly, "I was unwilling to have you disappoint yourself by coming to see me. My gifts are only those of the mind."

"Madam," said the lieutenant, with a gasping attempt at gallantry, "for the charms of those qualities I sought this interview."

His elaborate politeness in contrast with his discomfited appearance were irresistibly ludicrous.

"Miss Rapelye" burst into a hearty laugh, and Dr. Breck stood revealed in the disguise.

Langdon started with but anger, his hands clenched, his eyes flashing.

"Breck," said he, "dare you—"

"Lyle, old fellow, forgive me. I never meant the joke to go so far. I forbade you to come; I—"

At this moment the door was opened by a girl of perhaps twenty; her dress was gray; her hands filled with wild flowers, and a black jockey hat hanging by broad ribbons down her back.

"Cad!" cried Lyle, as she sprang to a child about to intrude.

But the girl stopped at the door-way and gazed at the author of strange figure, in astonishment.

"Cad!" echoed Langdon, as if the word electrified him, and the two gazed at each other as if for explanation.

"It is my cousin, Miss Rapelye," the doctor were forced to say.

"And I, Miss Rapelye, am Langdon Lyle," said the lieutenant, with effrontery. And then, with a sudden resentful flash, "Cousin!" Come, Breck, we must square this matter somehow. Pray, come in, Miss Rapelye."

But the girl stood en attitude stenante, or a statue, or a young lady very much astonished.

Lieutenant Lyle knew her cousin in that instant almost. The angry words and faces she had broken in upon! It was incomprehensible. She looked as if about to retreat.

Langdon darted forward.

"Pray, Miss Rapelye, come in for one moment, I beseech you. Your cousin has been playing some cruel tricks upon me, and as your name has been used, you should be interested in the explanation."

Miss Rapelye flushed crimson. She darted at lieutenant Lyle a look he'd say precisely the same into the room, scattering her flowers heedlessly along the carpet.

"Now, Cad," said Langdon, "what does this all mean? Think have you been up to?"

"Well," said the doctor, trying to make the best of his part, "I just thought I'd like to exchange letters with you for pastime, we were so dull down there, and thus convert you to the doctrine of correspondence; as I was peculiarly employed my little cousin to carry out the joke. I assure you, Lyle, I never intended it should go so far."

"And you used to send your cousin draughts to copy, to me?"

"Yes."

"And how do you know that your draughts corresponded with those I received?" asked Langdon remorselessly stole a look at Miss Cad, who turned very white.

"Why one compare them," said Breck, rather stiffly. "And—"

"Oh, Cousin!" burst from Cad's lips, "I—I—confess—"

"Never mind, Miss Cad," said Langdon, recovering himself, "the device was clever, and—"

"At least, Lyle, you'll acquit me of any attempt to bring you here," said Breck, with one look of reproach at the guilty Cad.

"My dear fellow, I'll blose you for it till the end of my life."

"Well, there's no use—I've learned one lesson from the volume of practical joke," said the doctor, with a rueful laugh.

Langdon held out his hand.

"We're old chum-mates as well as comrades, doctor. Let's forgive and forget."

"Willingly, Lyle; and since you're here," speaking with comical gravity, "you can't do less than stay and dine with us."

"With pleasure, provided you put on a costume better suited to your sex and age."

The doctor went off to marig l Miss Rapelye and Langdon were alone together. He approached the piano, by which she stood plucking nervously at the flowers she held. Langdon beheld the realization of his fairest dream. Such large, lovely eyes as he had once seen in a picture and which had haunted him since, such golden waves of hair, arched brows and tender lips as he had often fancied but never found.

A delicious rapture surged in his breast. He leaned into exact reverie, gazing at this fairest face. Suddenly their eyes met. It was an instant of mutual embarrassment. Then the young man took one of the flowers in both hands from their work of destruction, and held it close in his.

"Cad," he said, in a low penetrating tone.

"Oh, Mr. Lyle," sobbed the girl, "have I done very wrong? I liked your letters so much, and—and so—and—"

"Cad—my sweet Cad," said our Lieutenant, "do you think you could like me?"

The rich tint of crimson swept over the pure face. The dark eyes rested for one exquisite instant on Lyle's, and then Cad suffered the gold-banded sleeve of her lover's blue jacket, while her head yielded to her lover's pressure, and she shrank against his breast.

"Oh, Lyle," it seems as though we must have been acquainted a long, long time," she faltered.

"Dearest," he answered, "when souls have met, as ours here, the eyes they look through are but inside souls and nothing else."

Langdon did not consider, probably, that a dull or indifferent pair of eyes are not quite an apt to look through those soul-windows as brilliant ones.

The rapturous silence of newly uttered love stole over their hearts and sealed their lips. That they were in the parlor alone, very happy, and quite absent in the warm, weeing, noon-day air, till Breck's coming footfall startled them. Then with that unconscious and unmistakable look upon their faces, they turned apart as the doctor opened the door, and Cad, with cheeks ablaze, brushed by him, out of the room.

Breck's quick glance read what had been plain to Lyle's for years.

"Langdon," said he, "you've got the best of my joke."

"Decidedly, Breck."

VRAI AMOUR.

I HEAR a voice, and tremble at the tone,
A coming step, to me familiar grown,
Makes my tongue falter, but the heart will speak,
Flaunting its signals o'er a blushing cheek.

I touch his hand and with it comes a thrill,
Fluttering and quivering, as the Aspene will,
When their shy leaves receive the south-wind's kiss,
And rushing whisper back their tender bliss.

He speaks my name—and then it seems to me
Like the refrain of some rich melody,
Heard through the night-fall of a summer-day
When stars and fire-flies light the dimming way.

His eye meets mine—swiftly the curtain falls,
Ah, me! the messengers have crossed the halls,
And, with white feet, go wandering through my soul,
Painting sweet pictures on its waiting scroll.

Absent from him, and e'en the more glorious day
Seems dark with clouds, and noiseless drags away;
Seen by his side, the very clouds look bright
And all earth gladdens in love's perfect light.

How We Trapped the Burglars.

We lived in a street, at the time in which my tale is laid, within five miles of the Battery, and the dark month of December was upon us. The series of burglaries, except in our neighborhood, and no less than three houses out of the ten in the street had been entered by burglars and robbed when the discovery of the thieves had taken place. So shy, also, had the work of entry been performed, that in no case had the inmates been alarmed, and it was not until the servants descended in the morning that the discovery of a robbery was made.

In two out of the three cases, an entrance had been effected through a pantry-window, by removing a pane of glass and cutting a small hole in the shutter. This window was on the ground-floor, and easily reached, being secluded, and certain. In the third robbery, an upper window was entered by means of a knife which forced back the fastening, and of course allowed the sash to be raised.

So rapidly had these robberies occurred, that the whole neighborhood was alarmed. The police shook their heads, and looked knowing, but did nothing; and what was much to be lamented, failed to lay hold upon the robbers, who, they at the same time asserted, were evidently not regular professionals.

Affairs had reached such a stage, that we used to sleep with a revolver close to our bedside, when we happened to have a friend who came to stay with us a few days. This friend was an old jungle-hunter, and was au fait at every artifice by which the animal creation might be captured. He was delighted at the idea of having an adventure with burglars, and seemed the belief that they were more than a match in cunning for even the sevenest jungle-hunter. It was in vain that we assured him it was an axiom that an accomplished robber could effect an entrance into any house; and that instruments were used of such a nature as to cut holes in doors without noise, and, in fact, that through roofs and sky-lights, down chimneys, and up water-spouts, an accomplished burglar could easily enter the best defended house in the kingdom.

Our friend's argument was, that the man was a man on watch, who took advantage of the residents being asleep and unsuspecting; "but," said he, "if any suspicions be raised, and I will defy any burglar to enter my house without my having due warning; because, although I may be asleep, still I shall hear his approach, and can then make my arrangements to welcome him."

Although we were not desirous of having our house broken into, still we wished that our friend's confidence should be taken out of him.

A few days after this conversation, the police informed us that several suspicious characters had been seen about, and recommended us to be on the watch. Upon this, was a good opportunity to test my friend's skill and watchfulness; so, having informed him of the policeman's warning, I asked him if he felt confident to undertake the defense of the house.

"Certainly," he replied; "I only demand a double battery, and I undertake that you have a pair of slippers beside your bed. I also must go to bed last, and no servant is to go down stairs before me in the morning; nor is any one to walk about during the night; then I will defy the burglars."

Upon it was agreed that my friend was to act the part of guardian, and was to commence his charge on the ensuing night.

It was quite late when bed passed, and no alarms had occurred, and no robberies taken place; we began to think our alarms had been groundless; but our friend said that now was the very time we must be guarded, for that no wise burglar would rob when he was expected; besides, he said, we have not had the "all clear" given yet; it is when we have drove ratie, and the chimney rumbles, that robbers are to be looked out for; and not a moment's noise is unlike; thus, he said, he did not give up hopes of yet having something to say to the robbers before the night terminated.

I usually sleep very lightly, and therefore awoke readily upon hearing a tap at my bedroom door during the early hours of our watch. It was my friend's voice that answered me, and we were requested to come out at once.

"I've got a prize, a burglar match," I replied.

"Nonsense, man; a light will spoil the whole thing. Come as you are, dark, slip on a dressing-gown and your slippers, and come at once."

I was soon provided as he wished, and ready to descend the stairs on the dark.

"Now, remember," my friend said, "there are seven steps to the first landing, twelve others afterwards, and the fourth step creaks remarkably, so be careful to descend without noise."

The night was boisterous, and many a window and door shook and rattled, so that the slight noise we made in descending the stairs was not sufficient to have attracted the attention of the wood listener. We despended to the ground-floor, entered the pantry, and then, standing perfectly still, darkened ourselves and listening.

In a very few seconds we heard a grating noise on the shutter, then an interval of quiet, and again a noise; presently we heard a sash gently raised, and again all was quiet. The noise of a heavy vehicle passing the house seemed to affect an opportunity for a more decided effort, for while the rattle of the wheels was loudest, a crash sounded from the shutter, and we could hear the bolt was forced, for the shutter was gently moved.

"Don't stir till I do, and hold your breath if possible," whispered my friend in my ear.

I found the latter a difficult request to comply with, for my heart was beating with rapidity, and a thumping noise in my ribs in the meantime I was still I stood quiet, and trusted to my friend.

Nothing could be more cautious than the proceedings of the robber; the shutter was pushed back in the most slow and steady manner; had there been more than a bolt fastened to it, I knew whether it would have been made to ring. At intervals there was a rest from work, evidently for the purpose of listening, and the noise of the robber placed his leg across the window-sill, and lightly descended into the pantry.

The moment he was out of doors, was very dark, and in the corner where we stood it was black as Erebus, our forms, therefore, were quite undistinguishable, and we were safe from the observation we was by touching or hearing us.

The first burglar was soon followed by a second, and while we could hear that a third, who was outside, was to remain there on watch.

"Now keep still up," said my master two.

"Not yet, till you push the shutter to," replied the other, "or the glim 'll be seen; then you may show your hand."

The shutter was quietly pushed to, and both robbers moved away a few paces from the window by which they had entered. Then my friend, who while they walked, it was evident that they were either without shoes or had on India-rubber overalls. Of these sire or weapons we could see nothing, and I began to doubt whether our position was at all tenable one, as I was armed only with a sword, a weapon, however, I knew how to use, whilst of my friend's means of offence or defence I knew nothing.

I had not long to wait, for a lucifer was struck by one of the men immediately, and the room was momentarily lighted up; at the same instant my friend drew up the slide of the dark lantern, and directed the light on the face of the nearest man, at the same time showing the muzzle of a revolver pointed towards them.

"If either of you move I'll put a couple of bullets in him," said my friend, as he placed his back against the window by which the men had entered. "Now drop that crow-bar," he continued, in a voice of authority; "down with it; and you," he said to me, "pull open the shutter, and shout for the police."

The idea that is usually entertained of a burglar is, that he is a man of great size, strength, and daring, and that he would in an encounter annihilate any moderate man. When, then, the light revealed the faces and forms of the men we had captured, our number self, although no great pugilist, yet felt able to defeat either of them if it came to a matter of fists; and I must own that the pale and astonished faces of the men were not indicative of any very great courage.

Our chief officer was shortly answered; and the ringlets having been subdued by the sight of the revolver—the muzzle of which pointed first at one then at the other—were captured by the police, three of whom were speedily on the spot, and conveyed them to the station, whilst the chief detective who had been brought down some days previously, examined the details by which the man had effected an entrance.

"You were very lucky to hear them, especially on such a night," said the detective; "when once they're in they are safe as a church. We have tried and I expect they'll get seven years."

The man was about correct, for one, the elder offender, was sentenced to six, the other to five years' penal servitude.

"It will, I suppose, be of no use trying to sleep again to-night, for it is three o'clock," said my friend.

"I cannot sleep," was my reply: "and I am dying to hear how you found out that these men were approaching the house."

Being, that night, as we partly rolled ourselves, lighted a fire in the kitchen, and soon being provided with cigars and grog, got very comfortable, and enabled to work freely. My friend then began his account, which he gave much in the following words:

"The burglar, as I told you, has usually the advantage of surprise; he can select the time at which he makes his attack, and if his proceedings are carried on cautiously, can enter a house before he is heard. Few men would, however, venture to do so, unless they previously had good information as to the interior arrangements of the house; this they obtain either from servants, tradesmen, or some one who has been in the habit of entering themselves as tramps, or with some trifle to sell. Thus, if there are bells attached to doors or windows, they know at what height they are placed, well the domestic arrangements of the locality they purpose trying their skill upon. There are, too, convenient methods of protecting doors, such as bolts, bars, chains, locks, &c., all of which require more time and proper instruments to overcome. It therefore occurred to me that novelty and simplicity combined would be more than a match for the coarse indolence of a burglar, and thus I made my plans, which, you see, answered very well."

"So doubt about that," we replied.

"Well now, come up to my room," he continued, "and see the apparatus."

We mounted to the room, and there, close beside his pillow, was a tin box, in the bottom of which was a key.

"This is nearly all the apparatus," he said; "but you notice some thread fastened to the key; trace that thread, and you will find that it passes through the box, and out at the sash; from there it goes down to the back-yard; and now you will comprehend my plan. I knew that no man could approach the back part of the house without walking up the back-yard, which is only four yards wide. I therefore fastened the thread low, and about two feet from the ground, some fine black thread; this was made fast on one side, but slipped through a loop, and tied up to my window on the other. The thread then passed through the hole I had bored in the window-sash, and was then made fast to the key. Under the key I placed the tin box, you see; and over the key was a bar, to prevent its being dragged up more than six inches. Each night, before I went to bed, I just drew the string tight, and fastened it in the yard, taking care to do it before morning, so as to keep the plan a secret. If, then, a man, or anything above two feet high, walked up the yard, the string was pulled tight, the key was drawn up abruptly against the bar, and the string broken, when the key, of course, fell into the tin box, making quite sufficient noise to wake me. Immediately the string or thread broke, it would fall to the ground; and the man who had done all this, if he would not have felt anything, the resistance being so slight. I must own I should have preferred horse-hair to thread, as in the case of a cut it is unseen very well. I was fast asleep when the key fell, but immediately awoke, and taking my lantern came to my door, lighted it, and made sure you, for I knew that a man only in the back-yard could have dropped my key. So now you see how the burglar was disposed of, for you know the rest."

"Certainly, you succeeded; and so we ought not to be critical," we replied. "But suppose they had entered by the front window instead of by the back, how then?"

"You see this thread," he said, grasping one that was near the door; "pull it."

I did so, and immediately a tin cup dropped into the hand-basin.

"That thread goes down stairs, and is fastened across the front-door key; but I should take off as I went out of my room, so that it should not impede my journey down stairs. Thus I could at once know whether a man was approaching the back-door or had entered by the front-window, and in either case I think I could have captured him."

Simple as had certainly been adopted in the present case, but the means had shown themselves to be efficient.

"People are usually very silly," continued our friend, "when they hear, or think they hear, suspicious noises of a night. The first thing they usually do is to light a candle, which proclaims to the robber that he has been heard, and most escape; then they go about the house with that candle, and make a great noise, so that a man may have plenty of time to get away, or to hide himself. Instead of this, if a person were to listen intently, he would be able to hear any suspicious noises distinctly, and decide upon their cause; then, as he must know his own house better than a robber, he is best off of the two in the dark; and when, having armed himself, he has quietly opened his door, he may wait and listen until the robbers are heard moving about, when he may safely proceed to the scene of action. If two persons were merely to plan what was to be done in case of robbers entering his house, and then were to carry out that if the occasion required it, burglary would be too dangerous and unsuccessful a proceeding to be popular or profitable, and thus safety would be, for a mere moderate means of obtaining a livelihood; so that really we may consider ourselves to have done the community at large a benefit, were it possible of these genius; whilst those who allow their houses to be robbed with impunity jeopardise their neighbor's property."

EMMA'S CHANCES.

BY A. BROOKGREEN.

ALL of Emma Wilson's lady friends treated her with disdain and scorn, yet her gentleman friends were charmed with her, and were ready enough for admiration or envy. A trim, little lady, always neatly dressed; a softly complexion, unpretentious features, dark grey eyes that expressed shrewdness; hair rather scant, but cunningly interwoven with a wreath of false curls, crowned her shapely little head with bandeaux, braids or curls, as became the fashion. Her tiny bloomin mouth was a study for a poet, such an inclination they had to the voter. They always strayed to hook-side, or, at least, to the edge of the handkerchief. Emma had a pretty voice, and while their artful owner looked around for a cross ing, which was sure to be forthcoming. It was on a occasion of this kind that Mr. Henderson was compelled to capitulate. A rain cloud had spread itself over the heavens, and as he stood by Wilsons' front gate, where Emma stood in pretty helplessness. Young Lawson would, doubtless, have carried the fair Walter Raleigh under the rain, he possessed a velvet cloak. He substituted a rail from a neighboring fence, and Emma crossed in triumph. Mrs. Wilson was a widow of long standing, and thereafter was a regular visitor at the Wilsons. Young men found it very agreeable to call on Emma, and Henderson found the Wilsons home "Wilson's Inn," for every eligible caller was invariably treated to wine and sponge-cake, and, as the jolly Mrs. Wilson was a most charming hospitality. Harry was surprised with many other gentlemen on his visits, and found that a young man of an appreciative epposite, his respect for Mrs. Wilson, and his admiration for Emma, were very high indeed. Henderson and Mrs. Wilson was not inconsible to this crowning ovtrstage, and in due season congratulated her upon having engaged the services of so eligible young man in H——. Mrs. Wilson, being well aware of the mutability of young love, and the peril of long engagements, urged speedy marriage, to which the wily lovers demurred. Emma did not wish to give up her freedom; Harry courted more riches, and was soon to start for the golden shores of California, to engage in mercantile pursuits. With regard to the former objection, lamentation, the young people parted. For a time there was a brisk correspondence between the loving lovers. Harry was happy in the fair one's affection waned tho soonest. Before many months she tormented him to present lover with accounts of her numerous conquests, and, getting still sufficiently, as she thought, by tender in reference to his absence, told Harry nothing.

"The squaws of the Sioux and Blackfoot Indians are the most agreeable women I ever met, without any exception, in the present century. For the last twenty years, or more probably, never, being perfectly contented where I am. Emma, of course, has to go to the Indian country before I can consent to admire the Indians and live among them for ever. Your pride must be wounded, but she had caused absolute freedom, which she thought I gave them, for she was as much in love as one of her dusky admirers could be, and I found her a charming student. William Markham was one of those rare geniuses who rise from obscurity by the sheer superiority of their talents. Although he had many of his acquaintances for his discrimination, yet he was captivated by Emma Wilson. She did not care a whit for his genius, but she loved him for fame. She did appreciate his fine personal appearance and graceful manners, and thought he would make a good-looking, good-natured husband. The day she sent her note of dismissal to Harry, a mighty walk was in prospect for that afternoon. Emma joyfully accepted the opportunity of securing another lover. A walk was, of all occasions, the most favorable for tender vows; there were plenty of brooks to be crossed, and Emma had such an indescribable charming way of winning help at such times! Moreover, she had colored the magic art of browns in old romances, who gained their conquests by fingers and white dresses.

While the dew yet trembled on the grass," and some home with dry feet and unsullied skirts. Emma had a most fascinating way of tripping through bushes and briars, never tearing her dress, nor being delayed by the irritating little brambles and wiry blackberry vines in her path. Perhaps it was this faculty of looking faultless on all occasions that charmed William Markham, or perhaps the cheerful Wilson setting-room captivated him. To his return from the woods with Emma, Mrs. Wilson welcomed him to a sparkling wood fire, which the chill evening air rendered most agreeable, and proffered the invitation to cake and wine. Artful little Emma slipped off the shawl that concealed her pretty figure, kept on her becoming hat with its lovely wild flowers; then, seated on a low divan, with one dainty foot peeping from the folds of her dress, she made so graceful a picture as a carewom and tired student could wish. And so William Markham became a victim. Emma did not know much, but she had the greatest knowledge of knowing herself. She was wise enough to listen gravely when William talked on subjects beyond her depth. He was one among many to the artful girl; blind to her faults, and thinking himself the most fortunate man alive. She coolly analyzed him in solitude. "He's handsome enough," she thought, "and agreeable enough, if he were only rich! But he will do if none better offers." This was the only evil thing that Emma's dream-life broke in his lady-love's thoughts! After an engagement of three months Emma left the city for a visit to the country seat of one a continental tour. He, like the most of mankind, was blinded, and thought Emma Wilson the truest, sweetest girl of his acquaintance. "She will brighten up her aunt," said Major Henderson, benevolently, knowing well that he would be the principal person to be pleased. Mrs. Henderson, ill-natured like some other women, couldn't see why Emma was such a favorite. "She's just forming matrimonial views on the first comer," she said, and Emma Wilson' front gate, where Emma stood in pretty helplessness. Young Lawson would, doubtless, have carried the fair Walter Raleigh under the rain, he possessed a velvet cloak. He substituted a rail from a neighboring fence, and Emma crossed in triumph. DAMASCUS BLADES.

WHILE so much attention is directed to the manufacture of new weapons of war, it is somewhat curious to note the fact that the method of making the best sword is a lost art, and all the skill of modern times is powerless to recover it. While we have been making great discoveries and improvements in the manufacture of steel, it is remarkable that no country can produce an article equal to the famous blades which are so celebrated in history, nor has Damascus itself been able for several centuries past to make even a poor imitation of the work for which it was once so celebrated.

These blades are no myth, as some persons have imagined. They still exist, numerous and highly prized by the descendants of those old warlike Sultans and Eastern princes, and not unfrequently are shown in the museums of collectors. We have seen lying before us, a short blade, rather a long knife than a sword, of that peculiar alloy which modern art cannot produce. The Sovereign of the Damascus weapon is not only its beautiful surface, showing myriads of waving and zigzag lines, running through the metal, but the elasticity and temper of the steel surpass all other kinds and how much a union of sharp edge with great elasticity as no modern art can equal. The point of a sword could be bent double in the hand, and spring back to its straight line, and the same sword would cut through a steel helmet and weapon without turning its keen edge, or would pass with astounding facility through a silk skein of handkerchief thrown into the air, severing it with a swift sharp cut. Scotts history of Saladin, and, we think, the Talisman, is not a relation of the romance.

The most costly and expensive experiments have been made to recover the lost art of making these blades, but without success, although in one instance a few specimens of Gen. Aroosoff, a Russian officer of great ability, were produced, equaling in every respect the old Damascus steel. But even he was unable to do it with any certainty, and especially to have what is known as temper behind him in such a shape as to be of practical use in the field. Gen. Anosoff was sent by the Czar to Siberian works, which he superintended, have failed to supply specimens of the required article, and the manufacture of such blades has entirely ceased.

The theories which have been put forth to explain the peculiar lines and veins in the Damascus weapons are various. Some have attributed them to the welding together with the steel, Gen. Anosoff, after careful examination with the microscope, pronounced that they were the result of the crystallization of the Steel itself, and that by the use of acids he could produce at will a system of carbonization which produced them with the same result, whether welding the blade with steel, he brought out the lines by the use of acids, and the veins by hammering. His works at Zlatoust became so celebrated as the Damascus blades, that officers of the Russian army used the steel blades, arms, razors and cutlery of various kinds to the exclusion of every other, thereby the best products of the modern world.

The greatest difficulty encountered to exhibit to his visitors the exquisite perfection of his work by performing the old feats which made a genuine veil in the air with one of his swords—a feat which no British steel could be made to perform—that he would also have horses, and other hard substances, with the same sword, without ever turning or injuring the edge. This he did well enough, speaking of Anosoff's steel, say that the result of the Russian's labors was to impress on cutlery the finest properties of a softer material." (Qyt. Abbott, a British officer who visited Anosoff, and the success of Anosoff, and for the present we have nowhere in the world a manufactory of Damascus blades.

A DIRTY SAINT.—Lady Duff Gordon has published a volume of "Travels in the East," in which she gives the following account of a "dirty saint." A holy man or saint, whom she encountered in her ascent of the Nile in her dahabeah. He was about to start on a journey for more to stop the boat, as a great sheykh had called to us, and there was nothing for it but to go ashore and see the sheykh. So we stopped, and Omar said, "Come and see the dirty saint." We found him sitting on the bank, with his legs hanging in the water, holding all sorts of things on the ground round his crossed legs, without the slightest attempt at order. He had his head shaved and naked, with the skin of a rhinoceros, all cracked with the weather like leather, and had not, probably, for summer and winter, coolnesses, for twenty years. He had a long white beard, he does not keep time, did, and yet he is a saint. Of course I expected a good deal from him, and he did not fail me. He greeted me with my visit, asked me to sit down, order, did he servant to bring me some coffee, and then I took a pinch of snuff and ever and over again; he was quite talkative, and told me about his former acquaintance, and how many of was one. Omar and my crew smiled and nodded, and all appreciated the visit. Then he laid his hand upon my own exclusive as the sheykh knows all people's feelings, and told me to follow I to prepare for dinner. Finally, Omar proposed to say the Fatihah, in which all Mussulmans join, and I, of course, assented. He began in the usual way, and was going on quickly, when I noticed that he was not pronouncing the words distinctly, and he knew that his position was secure, and thought his time and attention were more profitably employed. Omar then recited the Fatihah again, and we rose and gave the sheykh a few dollars. The dahabeah took no notice of this part of the proceedings, but he asked me how much I had given him. I told him the full amount, and he seemed to be satisfied. Omar was a counsellor of consolation through the whole assembly."

BALSAM OF WENLOCK.—The Arabs possess a wise practice in precedence for divorce. When married people find they are unable, the Arab knows, to live for some time with a discreet and austere man of the East, they make a friendly visit to their friends and see on which side blame lies. The elderly man means a party at the conclusion of which the husband and wife report in the absence of each other their impressions of the evening. Experience has demonstrated to the Arabs that the husband is generally to blame in families. The husband and wife put their heads together and discuss the manners of the people. Each strives to be more amiable than the other, to convince the "elder or latter" that it is not the one's fault if the honeymoon changed to quarrel. Odd love is awakened, and the pair thus went to the agreement's next starting the set and dog, return home-ward very happy.

THE peach was originally a poisonous almond. In fleshy parts were use to poison arrows, and the fruit was, for this purpose introduced to Persia. The transplantation and cultivation, however, not only converted its poisonous qualities but produced the delicious fruit we now enjoy.

THE FRIGHTFUL COLLISION ON THE HOUSATONIC RAILROAD, NEAR BRIDGEPORT, CONN.—From Sketches by our Special Artist, C. E. H. Boswill.

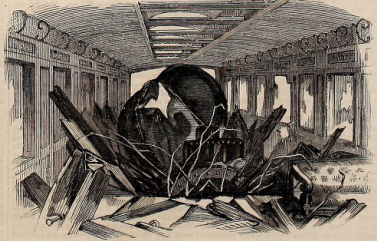
THE LOCOMOTIVE DASHING ENTIRELY THROUGH THE REAR PASSENGER CAR.

COLLISION
On the Housatonic River Railroad.

A FRIGHTFUL disaster occurred on the Housatonic River railroad, near Trumbull, Conn., on Tuesday, the 15th inst., by which seven persons were instantly killed, and eleven terribly, if not mortally wounded. It appears that the morning freight train from Bridgeport, becoming disabled, was stopped on the track, near Pequonnock mills, and signals sent back to notify an approaching passenger train, which, upon its arrival, was attached to the freight train, and was slowly moving back towards Bridgeport, when a new engine, which had been started on a trial trip up the road, suddenly turned a curve, and at full speed came in collision with the returning trains. Several cars were entirely demolished, the engine going literally through the rear passenger car. In the crash the boiler of the locomotive exploded, and very many persons were frightfully scalded.

SIR ETIENNE PASCHAL TACHE.

THE late Premier of Canada was of French descent, and was born at St. Thomas, Lower Canada, in 1795. In the war of 1812 he obtained an ensign's commission in the British volunteers, and took part in the battle of Plattsburg. Upon the conclusion of peace between England and the United States, he studied medicine, and practiced till 1841, when being elected a member of the Canadian parliament, he devoted himself to a political life. Upon the retirement of Sir Allen McNab in 1856, Mr. Tache was made chief of the cabinet. In 1860, during a visit to England, he was knighted by Queen Victoria at Windsor Castle. In 1864 he was again made Premier, a position he retained to his death.



SCENE OF THE CATASTROPHE NEAR BRIDGEPORT, CONN., ON THE HOUSATONIC RAILROAD.

AN anecdote is told of the Bishop of Exeter, England. The scene is a church in Devonshire. The bishop is present, but not officiating, and he sits with the congregation. The officiating clergyman ventures to soften to ears polite the phrase "Eat and drink their own damnation." He reads it "condemnation." A voice is heard loudly exclaiming "Damnation!" The whole church is startled. But it is not a profane epithet they hear—it is the voice of the bishop in rebuke of the officiating minister.

NO LETTER.

Oh, Hope! thou stolid tenant of
Each wayworn wanderer's worldly breast,
Can no alarms before thy gate
Erect once more thy warrior crest?
Hath love and fortune, long deferred,
So palsied all thy limbs of steel,
That life hath nothing in its record
To rouse thee up for woe or weal?

With listless foot and vacant train,
On dismal scheme I mark my round,
And scan with careless eye the crowds
I meet on unfamiliar ground.
Not gazing I by my path's low key,
Not prating by stranger hands,
My heart goes back o'er weary leagues
To clasp the love of other lands.

One daily pilgrimage I tread,
The Mecca of my stolid hope,
One path in mister darkness veiled,
With hungry outstretched, I daily grope.
Before a portal, prison barred,
My shibboleth I daily scan,
And watch a youth with countless worlds
Between a finger and a thumb.

I watch with eager eyes his face,
On which unmeaning silence broods,
Seen o'er the eloquence of man
In all his wondrous human moods.
I chafe, when, like some mere machine,
On board a vehicle he falls his touch,
And wonder why electric force
Should not unloose the vampyre clutch.

Life, love and death, beneath his hand,
Runs glib and facile, to and fro;
Stark, stalwart manhood wields
Like flashing meteors come and go.
The fierce defiance, greed of gold,
The cry for mercy—softly cried—
And one faint, wandering line from him
Who on the field of battle died.

My turn—in one brief second's thought
I span his life with hanging years;
My heart goes out through boundless space,
With clashing, throbbing hopes and fears;
I think of two sweet maids before,
Hung sobbing on my burning breast;
Whose words still linger on my ear,
"My own! my heart's beloved, my best!"

I think of how, through weary days,
I've stood, as now, before the gate,
And watched the human form within,
Machine-like as the crowds that wait.
I think, how, at the whispered name,
His hand went deftly to the spot
Where life was ebbing, and love and hate,
In welling lay—but mine was not.

All this but as the lightning's flash,
Before my eyes a missive lay;
A stranger's hand—his and mankind's—
What can this fearsome letter say?
God give me but a moment's strength!
Keep still my heart, the seals are torn,
One line alone, the rest is dark—
"She died at one o'clock this morn!"

Bound to the Wheel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "OUR WATERMAN'S MATE," "REUBEN'S VAN," ETC.

CHAPTER VII.—THE WORM TURNS.

THE group in the alderman's chamber is suddenly broken up by loud ringing at the gates.

"Anthony!" gasped Sleuth, suddenly.

"Anthony!" echoed the old man, his wits still wandering. "How sharp the boy is! Don't tell him, I'll hide myself here!"

The alderman was evidently recalling some incident of Anthony's boyhood. But it was not Anthony who came into the sick chamber almost immediately, but two gentlemen—the doctor and the lawyer, who, happening to be friends and neighbors, came together.

Sleuth gazed on them just for a moment, with an expression of face that did not suggest satisfaction; but the cloud of his face passed away from him wrong, he advanced with an air of deep melancholy to meet the new-comers.

"So glad you're come! This is a comfort! I have been looking for you ever so long. He's here, awfully bad, his head turning quite topsyturvy."

The doctor went to the old man, spoke to him, but could not get a single rational answer. He was raving some one—probably Anthony—for his extravagance, and being his temper hopelessly unsecret and unbiased criminal would defend himself in reply.

The doctor felt the pulse, holding the wrist for a considerable period, and looking steadily in the alderman's countenance. From time to time, as he thus stood, he put various questions to Sleuth, to which the latter answered very quietly and properly—his experience at the chemist's enabling him to acquit himself with credit. At last the doctor laid the patient's hand and arm carefully down on the bed-clothes, turned, brushed the lawyer's arm, who had been closely watching what passed, and they withdrew together to the corridor.

"My work here is done," said the doctor; "I only wonder how he has kept up so long. I shall not stay. A can do no good, and I have an appointment elsewhere." Then looking back towards the room, he said, with more than ordinary professional interest, "I have watched this case closely, and I am quite sure he doesn't want me now, and never again will want me."

"I am pretty much in the same position," responded the lawyer; "I got a message from him yesterday, not at all urgent—just such a message as I have often had from him about ordinary business matters. So either he must have fancied himself better than he was, or else had not then decided upon any important step. What can I do now? Nothing! You see yourself he is in no state to receive from or dispense to others."

"Certainly not" rejoined the doctor; "but it is possible he may have a bold interval before death."

"H'm!" muttered the lawyer. "I could perhaps stay a few hours—possibly till all will be over; but I don't see that he wanted me on any business of this kind. To tell you the truth, I don't much like—between friends be it like this Sleuth, but that's no reason why the alderman should. Besides, he ought to deal fairly with him. He pays him well, I suppose, but let him believe he meant to keep him here as his heir. But he's a close man, and whenever we talked the subject over he seemed to think that even telling me what he meant to do weakened his power to shift and change about just as he liked. I dare say he has some such things fix himself to his own mind. Anthony is the heir if he leaves nothing else. If he wants to alter that and wants me to aid, and is again fit to make a will, why, here's the very man on the spot who will take care no time shall be lost in fetching me."

The doctor smiled, and, before leaving, went to speak to Sleuth, who came out with him; and then he and the lawyer also had a word or two just enough to show Sleuth the lawyer knew nothing of the will in the safe.

It was odd that Sleuth did not enlighten him. Was it, with instinctive cunning, he divined that the lawyer would not be so strongly disinclined to stay near the dying man, did he know the true state of affairs—that Sleuth was in fact, master of everything, unless some new act was performed? It was with a sort of desire to act hastily Sleuth had the lawyer called in, and he now wished he had not done so. He heard what the doctor thought, from the doctor himself—that the alderman could not possibly live much longer—that he had given him opinion that, if he were to leave a moment or two of returning sanity, it would probably be but the brightness of the thickened light before the darkness. Success! success! Not even Anthony's arrival could now materially change the aspect of affairs. If he arrived whilst Sleuth was there would arrive, so that he might, by his own experience and testimony as to Sleuth's behavior, undo any fresh mischief the returned remarks, when it was found he (Sleuth) was the successor to the alderman's wealth.

Well, he must keep up, must, very wakeful, and redouble his care of the poor, dear old man. To give anxiety exception, and restrain the tongue of any who had a fly off, as if in a mad dance of triumph that the end was secured and near, he began to wash his face and hands, and brush his hair in the corridor, and study himself in the glass, under the improved state time produced, as if busy with some task.

"Is this how so rich and fortunate a gentleman as I shall be, may be expected to look when he goes out into the world?"

Apparently he felt he could afford to be critical, for he knitted his brows, looked sternly at himself, turned a little to one side, then to the other, and then—why then, some new thought tickled his fancy, for he smiled one of those broad smiles that overspread his face, whose shovel he had a heart and soul, such as they were, and that with all the strength of both his brawny arms. Was it the dawn of successful cunning? How his small eyes twinkled! It was evidently delicious—this thought! But the only words that escaped him were:

"Pretty fool! Let her humbug herself if she likes. Why not?"

But his face changes. The smile disappears from that reflection in the glosses, and a kind, considerate, careful look of his face arrives. Sleuth sees something by the aid of the mirror that at once rises and occupies his mind. Something that he must attend to before he turns to the bedside and there pick up a paper from the carpet.

What could it be? He is sure there was no paper there a minute ago. It must have fallen from the bed. No, for if it had been there, Sleuth certainly must have seen it, as well as he would had he been all the time the professional gentlemen were in the room.

Then it must have been under the bed-clothes, and thrown out by the alderman's restless gestures, when he took it up and goes into the corridor to read it, for how does he know what it may be? Perhaps he does not finish his own mental sentence, for he has already read enough to see he recognizes the paper as the very piece that had been round the minister, and as he catches the first few words he utters a cry:

"I, Silas Maude, alderman, being of sound mind, in proof of which I show by my present act what I think, and for that true will Richard Sleuth was drawing to sanity from but unworthy faith in the saving merits of the Redeemer, hereby cancel my erring soul to Christ, and say that I revoke, abolish, and make of no effect, the codicil, bearing date of March 22d last, in his (Sleuth's) favor, and heretofore the will made previously, in favor of my well-beloved nephew, Anthony Maude, whom I pray God to bless and to inspire with fervent zeal to carry out my wishes, as therein expressed. And if he likes to do anything for Sleuth he may—I won't."

So this was the state of things, was it? while he (Sleuth), in his idiotic joy, was already taking possession. This paper needed only to be witnessed, and there was an end of his glittering soap-suds-water bubble.

Were it new to do, he felt certain the alderman would not be able again to write such a document or to give instructions for such a one, even if the lawyer were ready, and Sleuth might take care of that matter; but an interval of only five minutes or dear reason might suffice to call the servants and take their signatures, and then—

It was awful, as he said to himself. The old man was a poor, weak, aged sleeping. Anthony's arrival might secure every step of the process and redress him (Sleuth) to impotence. Should he destroy the paper? No, no; it would be too dangerous while the alderman lived.

He went to that side of the bed towards which the alderman's hands was turned, and raised gently the edge of the wool mattress, and there he put the paper, assured the alderman could not get hold of it so he then was, but having first carefully noticed that it was within apparent reach of the alderman's hand, that he might defy any one to prove that it had not been deposited there by himself.

"Who's that?" murmured the alderman.

"I, uncle—only putting you to rights a bit."

"Dick!"

Sleuth went round and saw the fingers of a hand just pushed forth from the clothes, as lacking strength or will to harbor. He took them in his own and pressed them.

"Better, uncle?"

"Where's Dick and cousin?"

"You've been a bit light-headed and funny, uncle—that's all."

"The child can't you let it stay up? I should like to look out on the park once more."

Richard Sleuth had, as usual, drawn down the blinds at the first approach of twilight. Had rather a contempt for what men called love of nature, and never saw a big tree, but calculated men made a choice for wood and admiration, without, sooner or later, trying to get at its value as timber. In coin, by which he understood them.

"What's that—the moon?" said the alderman, in a low, trembling voice, touched, as it were, with the hand of death, as his nephew drew open up the blind, and let in the soft glory of a lovely moonlight, which, as it shone into the room, caused the old man's head-face in the bed, and revealed in beauteous white radiance the further parts of the chamber.

The face of the dead and gazed not! his heart was full, and tears began to fall. He had never felt till now how beautiful life was. He could see the sweet, tranquil look of dark free nature in the neighboring park, and the gleam of a fair lake, and the passage of a long line of deer in single file across the distant ridge, where the dark, graceful forms were strongly thrown out against the moonlit sky.

But the old man has no longer the soft glory of the moon, the graceful form of the deer, or the deep tranquility of the park pools, for some cry of distress in the rond brings back to him that fearful pang in his life when she, his daughter, had left him for ever, and been sent away to die, even while she appealed to him in all the agony of despair:

"Father! father! father!"

But all these things softened him now. He thinks he can yet do something, if it be true that he has wronged Anthony, and if Anthony will but come.

"Dick," he said, after a pause, "I've had a strange dream. I think it has done me good."

"What was it about, uncle?"

"Why, I saw my little girl again, and she was singing to me and reproving me sweetly for being such a dunce in learning the song; and then, somehow, the girl changed to a boy, and I don't know what was singing. I heard from him; it almost seemed to have been a bird's song that I heard."

"There was a little blackguard, uncle, whistling in the paddock; he had got there to sleep for the night, I suppose."

"Dick," murmured the alderman, recalling himself to the task, "I shan't live to see Anthony. Hold your tongue, do! Call Phillis and the lawyer—quick!"

"And the other servants, uncle?"

"Yes, and the other servants, after a pause, as if he tried to guess Sleuth's thought—and succeeded.

Sleuth moved to execute his orders. But his eye fell upon the paper from under the cover of the mattress, which he could do unseen—the alderman's face being turned the other way.

"Quick, Dick! quick! Phillis. The alderman called out sharply:

"What are you about?"

"Only making you comfortable, uncle, before I go!"

"Comfortable!" ejaculated the alderman. Then remembering the previous touch of the bed, where the paper had been deposited, he said, suddenly:

"Dick! give me that paper!"

"The—paper—uncle!" murmured Sleuth, his smooth, white face becoming, if anything, smoother and whiter, but somehow more sickened in expression than usual with him when surprised.

"Yes; you know. And I know."

What Sleuth might have done and ventured if he had seen the paper at once, he would pray badly have himself been unable subsequently to say; but as it was, he stooped, and professed to pick up something, and said, holding out the paper:

"Is this it, uncle? It must have dropped from the bed."

The alderman said nothing. All his dislike was justified. Dick Sleuth was now proved to be an unmitigated scoundrel. No doubt he had read, and had been about to destroy that paper.

And did not Richard Sleuth know what the alderman was thinking? His face had something in it, which caused the alderman to grasp convulsively the bell-rope, and try to pull it. But his arm is restrained by a stronger arm—Sleuth's.

"What would you?" gasped the alderman, as their eyes met, in fearful proximity.

"Nothing, uncle—only to—to explain——"

Before he can begin this new and difficult field of oratory he is obliged to turn his head to see what it is that has suddenly, even in such a position, drawn the alderman's furious eyes towards some object beyond. His former, intense grasp of the old man's wrist, and becomes pale with terror at the sight of a new and more dangerous enemy than Sleuth.

A man, whose face is covered with thick black crape, that just allows a dim outline of it to be seen, stands close to the fancy with new horror, stands at the door of the dressing-room, clad in a long, dirty, smock frock, and holding a dark lantern in his left hand, which hangs low, the light not being wasted just then, and the right hand pointing a pistol towards the two men.

"Easy, genie. Drop that ere bell, will you? Not a blessed bit of use your 'calls will hurt, if only you keeps still. No, young man, you needn't trouble to go to that door; it's locked t'other side. You won't be civil?"

He levelled at Sleuth, who was slinking off by another door. Sleuth stopped, as if turned to stone, and the burglar began deliberately to play with the cock of his pistol, as if he had taken pepid and tolerably just measure of the danger to be apprehended from the sick old man and the chicken-hearted young one, and could afford to amuse himself.

"No, no, no!" hurriedly cries Sleuth, in appeal, while his hands wave nervously to and fro, in deprecation of the pistol's aim. "I won't move again. My good sir; excuse my fright."

There is at this moment a violent ringing of the bell.

"Anthony! Anthony! That must be him! Thank God!" cries the alderman.

The burglar stares a moment, as if to make sure that this is no trick; then says, as if thinking only of Sleuth's behavior:

"Don't you be afeard, you! I'm quiet enough, if you're civil."

"Fool! He's flying faster than you can follow him. Quick! quick!" cries Sleuth.

Not all the cafes in the world, if every one of them had been stuffed full of gold and gems, would have induced the burglar to have left the side of the alderman's bed, or the room, if he had not felt assured the alderman was right, and that the young fellow might even yet be scared without much risk. But the moment he saw that, he saw also a possibility for that which was to him with an unpleasant feeling, but which promised, even at this dangerous hour, when every chance seemed against him, to remedy all.

"Don't be afeard, uncle; I'll guard you! I think that's Anthony. I do so hope it is!"

Away went Richard Sleuth, beaming, as he went, how his speech had created a soul of mirth even under the rise of death, in the hearts of the brave old man, the burglar, by his state, and inspired by the excitement of the moment, rose to his knees, that he might better look into the dressing-room, the window at which was then full in his sight.

Sleuth had gone, pistol in hand, into the corridor; and running down the staircase of communication about the house, the alderman could not make out whether it was through Anthony's arrival or Sleuth's flight that he was left by the burglar. But back comes Richard Sleuth, running fast through the corridor, evidently pursued by heavy footsteps, and with a thundering noise he bursts, and throws into the sick chamber, his hands clashing as if with palsy.

"Oh, uncle, they are coming!—both of 'em. Can't get out the other way; Anthony's there!"

"Brave boy!"

In rush the two robbers into the dressing-room, not, however, seeking Sleuth, but seeking a mode of escape. The window is up, and one robber all but jumps through it to the ground, as light and instantaneous are the touches he gives to the lawful owner.

The other robber is a slower man, and heavy with the plunder of the safe, while both are tolled up in a red pocket-handkerchief. He is about to throw it to his comrade, and has got one leg on the window-sill, when for his descent, when the alderman cries:

"Now, Dick, fire!"

"I—I—daren't, uncle!"

"Give it me."

Sleuth hesitates just a moment, moved by some inexplicable impulse or motive, but gives the pistol, and the old man fires.

"Stand, thief!" says the alderman, growing faint, and retreating, with difficulty, his kneeling posture, while striving to pear through the smoke.

"Can't stand, more I!

"Yes, uncle."

Sleuth took the pistol, and knew the moment was serious. The burglar's head only was visible; he was not attempting to fire in return, but only the murderous gesture, but had only time to give one terrible cry, and the next moment was lying a confused heap on the bed. Dead—dead at last! The worm had turned, and to some effect.

CHAPTER VIII.—WITHING OUT THE TRIAL.

Yes, the crime was consummated. The thought, terrible but fascinating, that had been tempting the murderer onward, in spite of timid shrinkings from danger, ever since he had discovered that Anthony had been sent for, and that he was to be disinherited; the thought that had drawn nutriment and strength from every fresh one of the alderman's contemptuous jibes; that had at last promised to be his only friend, who could at once secure him all he wished—the alderman's wealth—and guard him from all he feared—the alderman's exposure of him as a rogue; that thought which, however attractive in its aim, had still been apparently hopeless of successful accomplishment, had suddenly said to him, in irresistible language, when the burglar had been fired on, "Now shoot luck!" and, lo! the deed was done.

All this swept through the murderer's brain as he stooped over his victim to make sure he was dead, and he murmured half audibly the words, as if to the listening and disembodied spirit of the old man:

"I didn't mean it! No! You shouldn't have provoked me so. Even a worm will turn!" Then he added: "Did he see me? I tried not to see him!"

Richard Sleuth then turned from the past to the future, and felt his whole frame quivering with an agony of vague apprehension, that might have caused him to discover all if just then questioned, but that the new fear of particular danger overmastered it, and caused his faculties to rush, as it were, to the rescue with extraordinary promptitude. The deed was done; the creature for whose gold Sleuth had thirsted as the hound thirsts for blood, was hunted down at last. Now there was to go back step by step and erase the trail.

Could he be found out? With fearful rapidity he ran over all possible contingencies, and strove to calm himself as he saw danger after danger loom before him. The pistol! It was the alderman's. It had been fired twice. Both barrels were empty. His blood seemed to congeal as he saw, at the very beginning, a fatal piece of evidence ready. Two shots only had been fired, and one of these had killed the alderman. If from the burglar's pistol, then the other barrel of the alderman's pistol must still contain its charge. No; it is empty!

While he madly hunts for ammunition to re-load the barrel, he sees smoke from the bed. It is the burning wadding. Fresh danger! Had that been found, it might have been known to have come from the alderman's pistol. He extinguishes the fire between his fingers, unconscious of the pain; then, having obtained the powder and ball he brought from the bureau, he used the same piece of wadding, partly to save time, not seeing any of the proper wadding in the bureau, and partly with the desire to get safely rid of it. As he finishes loading and murmurs, "That's done!" he hears first one explosion in the outer air and then another.

"Anthony and the robbers! Perhaps they may kill him!"

He now hunts for a second or two in a cupboard, and brings out a roll of tobacco Anthony had sent his uncle as a present just before the quarrel, and which the alderman had ceased to use after the quarrel. Sleuth s ripped the paper off with shaking hands, threw the tobacco into a corner of the cupboard loose as it was, then roughly shaped the paper like the piece of wadding he had found burning on the bed, then burnt it with the candle just as the other piece had been burnt, and then put it on the bed, exactly where the other piece had been.

Catching his breath, in a new paroxysm of fear, as he felt how few were the minutes he might yet have, even if more than seconds were to be accorded to him, but drawing hope from the noises he heard outside the house, while there was still comparative stillness within, he now hunted for the paper so lately forced from him by the alderman, found it under the bed-clothes, and saw vividly not only its danger to him as regarded the possibility of questions being raised upon it as to his right to the property, but the infinitely greater danger that such a paper—unwitnessed, and wanting only to be witnessed to disinherit him—would of itself suggest to the world a powerful motive for murder, if the man concerned were capable of it. He is about to light the paper at the candle, when he thinks he hears a hand placed against the door, as if feeling its way in the dark. He stands gazing fearfully round with parted lips and glistening teeth, and the candle shaking and flickering in his fingers. Perhaps some one looks through the keyhole! They may not yet have seen the paper. The candle and candlestick are dropped, as if accidentally, from his hand, and he is in partial darkness—the moon having become obscured, and his eyes being unprepared.

Instantly the paper is torn into pieces, and then, not knowing what else safely to do with them, the panic-stricken murderer eats them.

Now for the codicil. That once in his possession, and he safe back to his room, he may give the alarm. But is he watched? No mistake now. A single slip in his precautions, and there is the gallows. He sees, and grows almost brave with apprehension.

"Ha! yes! it is Anthony."

Sleuth hears now his voice in the court-yard, and recognizes it. He runs to the window. Yes, there is Anthony, the centre of a group, with lights in hand, through which he is trying to make way to enter the house, doubtless in search of his uncle. He wears a white, or very light coat, and has a pistol in his hand.

How quickly Sleuth can think in this awful emergency! He glides back to the dressing-room, remembering he had a coat that would, at a distance, seem not unlike Anthony's, and which, being a very expensive one, though purchased before the alderman's visit in his carriage to fetch him from the chemist's shop, he had kept out of sight in his box, for future display. Anthony's extravagance, he had soon learned, was the rock of offence on which Anthony's fortune had gone to wreck. He (Sleuth) would take care not even to be suspected, so he kept the coat close.

As he hunts for it, he remembers that if he has been watched in the room, as he had fancied, the watcher must know who it was—the coat not then being on. What then? He had done nothing there since the murder that could be dangerous to him, except destroying the paper, and that he had done in the dark.

What he has to fear is the being seen going from the murdered man's chamber, on secret business of his own, before giving any alarm; going, too, to a safe in a distant part of the house. That would be a very ugly fact, indeed, to get over, if suspicion were at all excited. The coat! the coat must guard him. The coat is got out and put on—for he sees only too well now for his comfort, through the partial light—and then he moves swiftly through the dressing-room into the corridor, and on into the room containing the safe. There he is again in the all-shrouding darkness, for the shutters have been put up. But he has had to pass on his way the head of a staircase, and there was light enough at that point for any one below to see him pass. How cheaply now he thinks he purchased his coat!

Groping his way to the safe, he finds it open, as he expected. He puts in his hand—it is empty! Literally empty! He feels the cold metal everywhere—nothing but the cold iron. He stoops down to the floor, but finds nothing. He crawls along from end to end—once, twice, thrice—so as to feel every part of the floor; now down the middle; now down the right side, now down the left. There is nothing. The robbers have swept all away—not having time, perhaps, after the alarm given by Anthony's arrival, to discriminate.

Is he a murderer for nothing? No, no, no! Impossible! He knows better. It will turn up somehow. Perhaps the robbers have been deprived of their spoil by Anthony and those who may have pursued them. But if Anthony finds the codicil, will he give it up? Yes; Sleuth thinks he will. And if the robbers have carried it off, they will soon see it is useless to them and precious to him. Surely, he thinks with alarm, they won't be such idiots as to suppose he would object to treat them handsomely.

He hears advancing steps through the corridor. He runs and locks the door. Then as he pants in dread of this new danger—this barring his retreat the way he came without showing his face—he hears the voice of the housekeeper outside, who had only heard, not seen him—

"Mr. Sleuth, is that you?"

This is fatal! No! With unwonted spirit he unlocks the door, then flies across the room towards a window, allows himself to be just seen, as a man's figure in a light coat, by the housekeeper, and then hears her, to his intense satisfaction, cry out:

"Oh, Mr. Anthony! Mr. Anthony! don't go after them again. Your uncle! your uncle's murdered!"

But "Mr. Anthony," as if carried away in the ardor of his pursuit by some new trace of the burglars, has got on to the balcony, and dropped to the ground. And then, by some wonderful feat of speed and subtlety, Sleuth has got rid of the coat, run round through a maze of circuitous passages—for he must avoid been met—got into the house, and then run up the staircase to the corridor, before the aged housekeeper (whose steps were slow, and who delays just for a few seconds watching after "Mr. Anthony") has reached the same spot. And out he pours upon her the story which his scheming brain had devised during his run.

"Oh, Mrs. Milton, I have lost them—the villains! Such an escape for me! They—I mean one of the villains, as he was getting down from the window, fired at me, but he missed! And I rushed at him—yes, through the smoke—yes, and through the window, and jumped to the ground after him, but lost them either in the shrubberies or over the wall."

"Eigh, Mr. Sleuth, this is an awful night's work. That villain has shot the poor old dying master when he missed you."

"Shot him? He's not—not living?"

"No, he's dead enough. I found him all of a heap on the bed, as if he had been kneeling up."

"He was! he was! It was he who fired at the robber. Dear me! Perhaps the robber knew that, and aimed at him and not at me when I was trying to guard my poor dear, dead uncle. Oh, my poor dear uncle!—my poor dear, slaughtered uncle!"

And Richard Sleuth wept—positively wept. Then he said:

"He wasn't always kind to me; and shouldn't be surprised to find that Mr. Anthony gets everything; but I shan't forget him for all that—my poor, dear, suffering uncle!"

They were now at the door leading from the corridor direct into the alderman's chamber. But finding it locked, and the key missing (thrown aside, no doubt, by the burglars, who had locked it), they went through the dressing-room, into the old man's chamber, and there they found Anthony in his light coat, bending over the alderman's body, which he grasped lovingly in his strong arms, while he was murmuring in language broken by passionate feeling:

"But one look—one word! Uncle! uncle! hear me! It is Anthony—Anthony who asks you for forgiveness—who, God knows, has so much need of it!"

The housekeeper and Sleuth stood there on the threshold, both silent; the one in awe and sympathy; the other, in hate and envy, which grew like gourds in the night, till they overshadowed Sleuth's soul, and protected him, and made him forget his mortal fear.

"My son," said a fond parent to his offspring, after having surveyed the wonders of the Crystal Palace—"my son, if you can tell me which of these marvellous works of man pleased you most, I will give you half a crown."

"The veal and ham pies," responded young hopeful; "give me the money."

A BALLAD.

BY HIRAM E. GRIFFITH.

Down in the vale where the violets
Peep out from the grassy sod,
And the wild grapes into the sunshine,
Are upward reaching to God;
There where the rivulet waltzes along
On its downward way to the sea,
There is a spider web strong and complete,
And I think it was spun for me.

Oh! there is a maid of great beauty,
Living down in the vale,
With hair like the darkness of midnight—
And voice like the nightingale.
And I heard her singing the other day
As I lay in the grape vines shade—
Oh! the vale is a pretty place to live,
And she is a pretty maid.

She is the spider that spun the web,
And I am the innocent fly;
To be caught in such web is a simple thing,
And there 'twould be joyous to die.
And daily the spider is charming me
Down in that vale so fair,
And I shall be caught, I know I shall,
For I love to linger there.

Miss Debbie Doolittle's Reformation.

BY E. S. BOURNE.

In the village of T——, a few years ago, lived Dr. Ephraim Doolittle and his two daughters, Deborah (or Debbie, as she was familiarly called,) and Miriam. The doctor once had been very well to do in the world, but the steadily revolving wheels of time brought round many changes, and fortune, fickle goddess, at length seemed loth to smile upon him. There had been a time when he was the only practitioner in the village, with an extensive country patronage; but, in the course of time, a new physician came, who was young, handsome, and rich withal, and not a few aspiring parents, who had marriageable daughters, gave to him their preference.

Soon came a severe pecuniary loss; but, worst of all, sickness entered the doors of the old doctor's mansion, and in spite of the medicated air which permeated the dwelling, laid its grasp upon the wife of his bosom so heavily that, alas! no skill could save her. Patient, loving and gentle, she passed away from life's pathway, and the sad hearts left behind felt for a season that she had taken all of its brightness with her.

Upon the two daughters now devolved the numerous household duties, and the responsibility of caring for their surviving parent, upon whose face time and trouble were beginning to leave their traces.

Miriam was a plain and unpretending little lady of twenty summers, although to all appearance much older. She was one of those quiet ones, who, while they accomplish great things, move on so noiselessly and easily that no dust rises in the path of their daily life to show where they are walking. Although the younger sister, she took the lead in all the domestic operations; and, though the casual observer might not perceive it, she was the good genius that presided over her father's home.

Her sister was called a beauty. Her features were faultless, her complexion clear and beautiful, and when she consulted her mirror she was well pleased to agree with the popular opinion.

But her name tried her sorely! Deborah was dreadful, the surname worse still, and she resolved to change it at the first favorable opportunity. Yet there never was a name more exponent of character than hers; for, alas! though beautiful, Miss Debbie was but a drone in the domestic hive.

So, in the mornings, while Miriam was busily engaged sweeping and dusting, or contriving some new feature in the culinary department, Debbie would be sitting in her chamber, in extreme dishabille, arranging curl papers and twisting bits of ribbon into excruciating bows, polishing her jewelry, reading novels, and frittering time away, doing little or nothing. Yet when the callers came in the afternoon or evening, Miss Debbie was ready to receive them with the most affable manner and bewitching smile. She would converse with the greatest ease, and touch the piano keys with the most graceful fingers. While Miriam timidly seemed to shrink from all attentions, Debbie gracefully received them all, and the fascinated visitors never more than stepped upon the sidewalk before, with one consent, came the exclamation, "What a lovely young lady is Miss Debbie Doolittle!"

So, while the few who had looked behind the scenes understood the rare worth of plain Miriam, the world without lavished its praises upon her sister.

Now, there was a young lawyer just settled in the village, who, being drawn into the charmed circle of Debbie's admirers, was quite a frequent caller at her father's house. Like many of his fellow-mortals he rejoiced in the name of Brown. But Debbie consoled herself by the reflection that, although common, it was much better than that of Doolittle; and, as the young man was rising to eminence quite rapidly, the position which his wife might one day fill was worth striving for.

So the weeks flew on, and nearly every evening brought Mr. Augustus Brown into the cozy little front parlor, which Miriam's busy hands kept so scrupulously neat and tasteful. To be sure Debbie could boast of a few landscape paintings against the wall, and a fancy basket upon the centre-table. The embroidery upon the low ottomans was of her handiwork, and the largest pile of music sheets upon the stand bore her name. Though she really accomplished but little, she had the faculty of making that little so magnify itself, that to the unsuspicious eyes of the worthy Mr. Brown she appeared a rare specimen of talent and industry.

Yet, for some reason, bashfulness, perhaps, he did not ask Debbie the question which she was daily expecting to hear, the answer to which she had long been practising. For she thought best not to faint, or show any extraordinary signs of perturbation upon the important occasion, but to answer a sensible question in a sensible manner, leaving no room for doubt in the mind of her interrogator.

But, alas! poor Debbie was doomed to sudden disappointment. It chanced one rainy morning that she went down into her father's office to obtain some ingredients for a cosmetic which she was preparing. After her usual custom, her hair, innocent of contact with comb or brush that morning, was twisted up in curl-papers. Her untidy wrapper had long since bid adieu to the most of its buttons, and was confined here and there by pins, which had made grievous rents in the crimson facings; while the little feet were encased in slippers which, though new once, were very ragged now, revealing hose whose open-work was of a very questionable character—the whole figure presenting a very ludicrous and slovenly appearance.

Now there was but one way in which to enter the office, and that was by a door in the hall, which, in consequence of the dampness, now opened with considerable difficulty. This door Debbie had closed after her. Just as she found the material that she was in search of, she heard voices upon the piazza. There was no mistaking the sound; it was her father, in company with Lawyer Brown.

"Come in, Mr. Brown," she heard the doctor say. "Step into the office until the rain has abated." The front door opened, and she knew that the invitation was accepted.

What was to be done? To meet him in her present plight was not to be thought of; to escape through the hall was impossible! Quick as thought she hurried into a closet whose door stood ajar, and fastened it upon the inside. How her heart beat! But she was safe now, however, and he would probably remain but a short time.

The doctor and Mr. Brown had a long talk together. They discussed the weather, the news, the village affairs. Mr. Brown told about his last case in court, and the doctor, in his turn, related the phenomena of a newly-discovered disease; while Debbie sat trembling in her little prison, and out of doors it rained and rained! Ten o'clock struck; eleven; twelve; and then, with a little stammering, Mr. Brown began in this wise.

"My dear doctor, I have long been wishing to speak to you upon a matter of importance."

"Well, say on, say on, my young friend! I am all attention. Do you wish me to assist you in finding a new client?"

"Not that, exactly; but, to be plain and come to the point at once, I wish to gain your consent to address one of your daughters."

"That is, you want one of my daughters for a wife. Ha! ha! a very reasonable request, Mr. Brown."

"Yes, sir! but I have not yet spoken to her upon the subject, as I wished to have your approbation before making any advances."

"That is right, all right, sir. Very honorable! very! You are a worthy young man, Mr. Brown, and I approve of your behavior in this matter. Which one of my girls"—

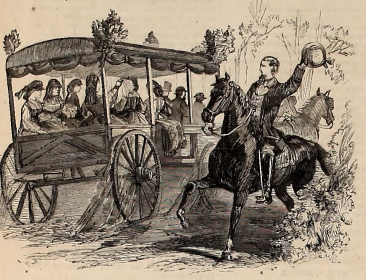
Here the dinner-bell sounded for the second time. Now, the doctor was the very soul of punctuality, therefore Debbie heard him say—

"Come, Mr. Brown, dinner first, business afterwards; we will attend to these affairs presently, and adjust them to your mind, I hope."

Then the two gentlemen repaired to the dining-room, where Miriam was awaiting them, looking as neat and tidy as any little housekeeper need to be.

"Now," thought Debbie, "is my time! I will slip noiselessly up stairs, dress quickly, and go down to dinner, excusing my tardiness on the plea of indisposition. After dinner papa and Mr. Brown can have their chat, and in the evening he will come in and propose. Then farewell to the hateful name of Doolittle!"

So she quietly emerged from her hiding-place. But that unfortunate hall-door was shut, and she vainly tried to loosen it, while some one seemed pulling as hard on the other side. The superior force soon overcame, and then, drawing back as the door swung inward, she beheld, oh horror! Mr. Brown! who had returned to the office in search of a missing handkerchief. Hardly believing his eyes he gazed at Debbie in speechless astonishment; and as she darted past him into the hall, and up stairs, the conviction forced itself upon him that the report of her slovenly habits, which he had hitherto disbelieved, was indeed true. He stood there for a second, and then, thoroughly disenchanted but half bewildered, he returned to the dining-room, where he astonished Miriam by putting salt into his coffee, and sugar upon his meat. Soon, however, recovering his self-possession, he entered into a conversation so pleasant that he wondered why he had not thought Miriam interesting before. Her tidy appearance and graceful bearing, contrasted very favorably with the slovenly figure which he saw retreating up stairs, and he was glad that he had not specified to the doctor which of the daughters he had chosen.



Debbie did not make her appearance that afternoon, and, in answer to Miriam's sisterly inquiries, complained of a severe headache.

When the gentlemen were in the office again, and the doctor said, "My young friend, if my daughter Miriam is the one you have chosen, I can recommend her, for she is a good daughter, and will make you a good wife," Mr. Brown did not object.

I shall not enter into the narration of the manner in which he wooed and won. It is sufficient to say that in six months there was a wedding in the cozy little parlor, although some wondered that Miriam was the bride.

A great change, however, came over Debbie. As she thought to marry Mr. Brown for a change of name merely, she remained heart-whole, but the lesson was abiding. From that time she strove in earnest to become all that a true woman should be, much to the delight of her friends. But it was not until Mr. Brown had been her brother-in-law three years that she became Mrs. Austin; and he still roguishly asserts that, had it not been for him, she would still have remained Miss Debbie Doolittle.

SCENES AND INCIDENTS OF THE FARMERS PICNIC AT AMBOY, N. J., SATURDAY, AUGUST 12.—From Sketches by F. H. Schell.

ON THE ROAD TO THE BEACH.

THE WATER MELON WAGON.

GRAND ANNUAL PICNIC OF NEW JERSEY FARMERS.

FOR several years it has been the custom of many New Jersey farmers, after harvest time, to visit the sea-shore with their families, for the purpose of recreation, picnic, bathing and "a good time." The custom had its origin in private expeditions, which became so general that it was finally decided upon, by common consent, that the second Saturday in August should be honored as a holiday, and that that day should be set apart for enjoyment in aquatic sports. So well recognized is the custom that for several years the farmers for miles in the vicinity of the sea beach have given it careful observance, and days are frequently spent in making necessary preparations for the journey. Many are the good things provided by the careful housewife; and the happy countenances of the children, who, through the "hosted term," fondly anticipate the pleasure of "going to the salt water," as the expedition is usually termed, adds zest to the scene of preparation. It is frequently the case that families, with improvised larders, amply stocked, travel 50 miles or more to do honor to the day, and it is not unusually the case that whole nights are spent in journeying towards Amboy, the favorite place of gathering. The scene at the beach, on the arrival of the various parties, is more than enlivening, it is cheerful in the extreme, and bespeaks the true spirit engendered by a day's relaxation, after a season of honest toil. The buxom country lads and lasses vie with each other in their efforts to make the day a happy one, and, to the honor of the New Jersey farmers, it can truthfully be said that, at their many annual meetings, no unpleasant occurrence has ever transpired to mar the hours spent on the sea beach.

We present in this number several scenes illustrative of the last annual gathering of the farmers and their families at Raritan Bay, Amboy, New Jersey, on Saturday, the 12th inst.

THE LADIES PREPARING FOR THE BATH.

LA ROQUETTE, THE PARIS PRISON FOR JUVENILES.

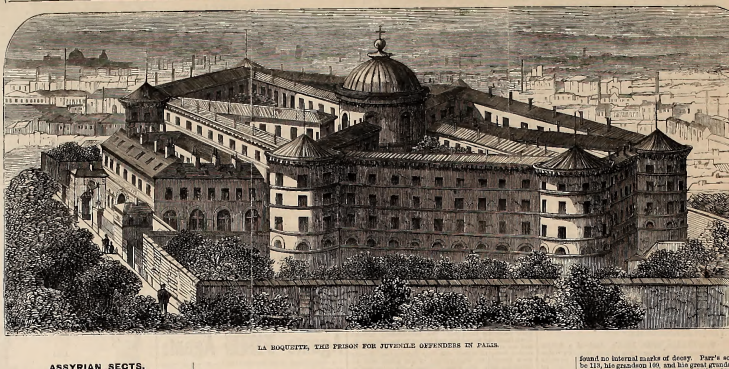
PROBABLY one of the most singularly ingenious prisons in the world is the Roquette in Paris built for the confinement of juvenile offenders. In several of the States in this country there are penitentiaries where the system of solitary confinement has been introduced, but only for adults. In the Roquette the youths some hundreds are kept in entire seclusion from one another by means of cells, in which they work and sleep, and from which they are permitted to go for a short time in the large yard within the walls for exercise, and then only alone. In no case is one obliged to remain until he strongly manifests his thorough repentance. One of the most singular features of the institution is the method of religious instruction, adopted at the Roquette. The vast corridors are so arranged that each inmate of the prison can see the clergyman while officiating, but not one another. In case, the Roquette is the most complete establishment for the solitary confinement of youth in the world.

ST. JOHN'S EPISCOPAL CHURCH, Richmond, Va.

THIS venerable edifice is one of the few points of interest connected with the history of the Revolution which remains within the limits of the once "so-called Southern Confederacy," unimpaired by the vandalism of traitors. It was here Patrick Henry made his celebrated speech, "Give me liberty, or give me death," which rang the knell of British tyranny in the colonies, and inspired the patriots of '76 to deeds of valor which will be remembered as long as the history of our country has a name.

HARLEM BRIDGE, N. Y.

THIS structure, the work upon which has ceased, for the present, owing to the Comptroller of the city of New York refusing to honor the drafts of the Commissioners, will, when completed, be classed among the most important improvements about the metropolis. The bridge is to be built entirely of iron, with circular piers and a "draw", of great length, which, it is thought, can be easily worked by one man. For a long time a substantial bridge over the Harlem river has been a matter of more than ordinary importance to the trade between New York and Westchester counties and after the disposal of some slight legal technicalities the bridge, now partially finished, will soon be completed.



THE practice of snuff-taking was probably introduced into Europe about the same time as smoking, and first appears to be publicly noticed in 1624, when Pope Urban VIII. issued a decree against the habit of taking snuff in church during the celebration of mass. In England it was formerly the practice to take snuff in a small spoon, and not by the pinch; in France, so late as the last century, a snuff-box was an indispensable appendage of every person having any pretension to fashion.

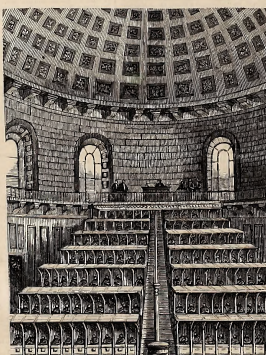
LA ROQUETTE, THE PRISON FOR JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN PARIS.



ASSYRIAN SECTS.

THERE are two remarkable sects, one of which, called the Mendajehs (disciples of John), is found scattered in small communities in Bassra, Karnah, Mohammerah, and lastly, South of Shuster, where there are about 500 families. Those of Bassrh are noticed by Pietro de la Valle who says the Arabs call them Sabeans. Their religion is evidently a mixture of Paganism, Hebrew, Mohammedan and Christian. They profess to regulate their lives by a book called the Sidra, containing many moral precepts, which, according to tradition, have been handed down from Adam, through Seth and Enoch; and it is understood to be in their language (the Chaldee), but written in a peculiar character. They abhor circumcision, but are very particular in distinguishing between clean and unclean animals, and likewise in keeping the Sabbath with extraordinary strictness. The Psalms of David are in high estimation with them, but they abhor and severely brand the name of Jesus. They baptize from garlic, beans, and several kinds of pulse, and likewise most carefully from every description of food between sunrise and sunset during a whole moon before the vernal equinox; in addition to which, an animal festival is kept, called the feast of five days. Much respect is entertained for the city of Mecca, and a still greater reverence for the Pyramids of Egypt, in one of which they believe that their great progenitor, Seba, sent out Noah, by hereditary and to his original seat. Sabia, are often they make very particular pilgrimages, carrying on these occasions a bull and a lamb. They pray four times a day, turning sometimes to the south and sometimes to the north. But, at the same time, they retain a part of the ancient worship of the heavenly bodies, adding that of angels, with the belief that the souls of the wicked are to enjoy a happier state after the cessation of suffering. The priests, who are called sloshks, or chiefs, use a particular kind of baptism, which, they say, was instituted by St. John, and the Chaldee language is used in this and other ceremonies.

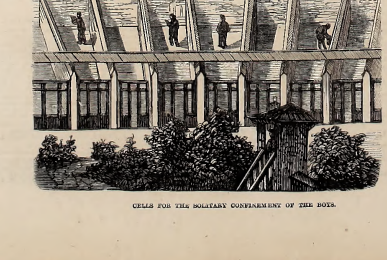
The other religion, that of a more numerous branch, the Yezidis, is, in some respects like the Mendajehs, but with the addition of the evil principle, the exiled doctor, who, as an instrument of the divine will is propitiated rather than worshipped, as had been once supposed. The Yezidis reverence Moses, Christ and Mohammed, in addition to many of the saints and prophets held in veneration both by Christians and Moslems. They abhor the sun, as symbolical of Christ, and believe in an intermediate state after death. The Yezidis refrain as not peculiar to themselves, nor do they eat pork; but they freely partake of the blood of other animals. Their manners are simple, and their habits, both within and without, remarkable for cleanliness. They are, besides, hospitable, sober, faithful, and, with the exception of the Mohammedan, more intelligent than their neighbor religions, they are, however, lamentably deficient in every branch of education. Polygamy is not permitted, and the tribes intermarry with each other. The males of the tribe live and die under the same roof, and the patriarchal system is carried out still further, each village being under its own hereditary chief.

OLD FOLKS.

THOMAS PARR, the son of John Parr, was born at Winnington, in the parish of Wimington, Shropshire, England, in the reign of King Edward IV., anno 1483. At 80 he married his first wife, Jane, and in the space of 21 years had only two children by her, both of them short lived. The one lived but a month, the other a few years. Being aged 120, he fell in love with and espoused Katharine Milton, a widow, who bore him one child—a son. Up to 130 he followed his vocation as a husband-man, exhibiting no symptoms of declining strength. In his 152d year, Thomas, Earl of Arundel, brought him up to London to the court of Charles I. He slept away most of his time, and is thus described by an eye witness:

THE INTERIOR OF THE CHAPEL DURING THE HOURS OF STUDY.

"From head to heel his body had all over
A quilkest, thickest, natural hairy cover."



Change of air and diet, better in itself but worse for him with the trouble and agitation of many visitors, or spectators rather, were conceived to have accelerated his death, which happened two months after his arrival in the metropolis, on the 15th of November, 1635. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. The celebrated Dr Harvey, the discover of the circulation of the blood, made a post mortem examination of his body, and found no internal marks of decay. Parr's son lived to be 113, his grandson 100, and his great grandson 114.

According to the Chicago Journal, the oldest man in America is Joseph Craisy, a French American, born in Detroit, in September, 1736, and baptised there on the 14th of that month, and who is now residing at Chicago. He must have seen some of the sons and daughters of the pilgrim fathers. He was eight years old when Washington was born, 13 when Wolfe was killed on the plains of Abraham, and upwards of 10 when the Declaration of Independence was signed. He has been married three times, and has had two sons and three daughters. He is residing with a great-grandson. His eldest son died four years ago, at the age of 105. Craisy is short, compactly built, and seems likely to live some years. He has lost all his teeth, but his bodily faculties are all sound. He has drank three glasses of whisky daily for many years, is a hard smoker, but regulates his eating. His memory is almost gone, excepting that of his long life; for the events of it are remembered. "Does as a child." The last paragraph is rather too closely copied from Fontenelle, who when congratulated on his 93d birthday, said, "Really, Death has forgotten me; don't remind him that I am still alive!"

HAIR.

THAT ill-fated beauty, Beatrice de Cenci, was remarkable for her beautiful golden hair; and a golden lock that once glittered on the head of Lucrezia Borgia, now lies quietly among the treasures of the Vatican. Queen Catherine Parr's hair was of this rare and splendid hue; Miss Strickland, who possessed a ringlet taken from this queen's head, after she had lain in her grave for more than 300 years, describes it as exactly resembling threads of burnished gold; and singularly enough the daughter-in-law of Henry was rich in the same respect. Elizabeth was proud of her golden hair, and loved to display it for the admiration of the courtiers. Of course, her fine features, if we red, not golden; and in a miniature of the time the painter has certainly lent color to the lips and cheek ill undoubtedly was—for, some half-dozen years ago, a lock of the great queen's hair was discovered in a copy of Sidney's Arcadia at Wilton. It had been presented to the chivalric poet by Elizabeth, and is described as soft, silky and wavy, of a beautiful golden brown color, without a tinge of red, and still shining as though powdered with gold-dust.

A MEXICAN VILLAGE.—We passed three villages in quick succession, and in about two hours, landed at the fourth one upon the right shore. Very soon quite a concourse of people were gathered upon the beach to witness, perhaps, the first landing of white men upon their shores. They brought beans, red pepper, Indian corn or maize, dried beans, round cake of white bread, leaf tobacco made up into small parcels of two or three cigars each in weight, and a kind of millet, pounded or broken. Several of the young girls and women were well formed, generally round-faced and fleshy, and of a very red complexion. There was one girl of some 16 or 18 years old, much fairer than any of the others, who was quite pretty. She was blind of one eye, several of the old people and younger children were afflicted with sore eyes, and among the women I noticed several cases of goitre. The people generally well clad, much in the Chinese style. In their houses, which are built in the rudest form, we were regaled with pipes, which were filled and lighted by the females who took first a few puffs themselves, and then handed them to the guests, not, however, without wiping the mouth-piece with the hand, or upon the dress first. Mats or carpets were spread upon the dirt, or divan, which generally extended around three sides of the family room. Here we were invited to sit, eat, or repose, as we might fancy. The house was governed, divided into sparements, one of which, the first you come, is the kitchen, where you frequently find smoking, or young calves, comforting himself, to say nothing of dogs, chickens or children. The best apartment is the sleeping, eating, smoking, and receptacle. Here they eat, sit, sleep, smoke, talk, and drink the entire household and their guests in separate groups, scattered upon the floor, according to their sexes, relations, by night or by day. The dishes are only removed to serve for the next meal, and the food is cooked in a covered fire-place, to say it in their and by night, and their seat and table by day. Different kinds of mats or carpets are spread upon this floor, with a small round pillow for each person. These pillows, with the padding, and much covering, as they have, consisting of light cowskin or cotton stuffs, we saw carefully packed in a kind of clothes press, built in the wall, in one corner of the room, where they are removed by the same natural house-wife, the morning, after the night's repose. The room is warmed by the hot air from the kitchen, passing in wooden pipes along the perpendicular wall of the divan, going out at the side of the house, and ending in a high wooden chimney, striking up in the yard adjacent to the house, within earshot of the inmates.

UN FOR THE FAMILY.

JOCKS is a strong believer in guardian angels. "If it was not for them," he says, "what would become people from rolling out of bed when they are fast asleep?"

"Do you suppose you can do the landlord in the 'Lady of Lyons'?" said a manager to a second actor in search of an engagement.

"I cannot think I might," was the reply, "I have done a great deal worse things than that."

"STRIKE your board," said a considerate fellow to his friend, when he was going asunder the coating girls."

"I had much rather steal theirs," said the unpromising young man.

MURPHY was asked how it was so very difficult to watch him in the morning.

"Indeed, master, it's because of taking your own advice, always to watch in the night. I'm afeard I misheard you attention to it."

TOM CLARKE, of St. John's, desired a fellow of the same name to let him Bishop Berrnel's "Holy Living and Their Complaint;" the other told him he could not spare it because he was going to read it himself, and could use them at all. He did not know whether the state genteman sends to Cross to borrow his bellows? I can only say that he sends and begs that I will spare them out of his carnother, but he might come there and use them all day long if he would, for me.

WHAT TY WAS.—A lady passing along the street, one morning last winter, noticed a little boy scattering ash upon the sidewalk for the purpose of clearing the ice.

"What is sorry, my little man?" said the lady, "I'm afraid he has an accident."

"No, I ain't, ma'am," replied the boy, "it's salt."

In one of our schools, a clergyman asked if any of the scholars could tell who was David's grandmother, when a little girl replied:

"A woman, sir!"

A SAD CASE OF FAIR PLAY.—In a shipyard, in Scarboro, the other day, a tar from a merchant vessel was observed by two men dragging a newly-set cross-cut saw through a huge oak log. The saw was dull, the log very hard, and there was no power to saw, see-saw, pull, push, push, pull. Jack stemmed the current of work, would be down to the assistance that they were pulling to see who would get the saw, and so one man was an immense log, and the other was a little fellow, he decided to see fair play; so giving the big man a push under the arm, and pushing him, he joined the saw out of the log, and giving it to the small one, he said, "Now, my boy, now cut."

"It goes far," said Lady Montague, "if to reconcile me to being a woman, when I reflect that I am in no other way so distinguished."

An epitaph in an Albany churchyard runs as follows:

Here lies of Johnson, the venerable dust;
Forty-four times he sailed round over sprad;
And here have come to rest their weary bones,
Their son and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Jones.

ANOTHER in Charlotte, England:

Poorly lived,
And poorly died,
Poor-ly interred,
And no one cried.

ANOTHER in a Scotch cemetery:

Here lies John Dawks,
Quite as like mine
With the sign of his inn
And his name at the sign
Turned up to the roots of the daisies.

THE botanists tell us there is no such thing in nature as a weed. We suppose they never heard of the "red blaze Rose."

IF LOUIS NAPOLEON is bent on pitching a quarrel, he should not scruple in picking the Power to quarrel with.

AT a large dinner party in a certain city lately, the hostess' mother had done considerable duty in supplying conversation, when a plump, happy-looking married lady, with much animation, said:

"Mother, you are so opposite," Mrs. —— you are not married and cold enough."

Amid an awful pause, the matronly answered:

"Yes, indeed, I am, very much troubled—but then they are not over."

HON. JOSIAH QUINCY says that C. S. A. means now, "Can't Secede Again."

THE rebel armies have nothing to do but to keep running, for, if they stand, they fall.

THE Deerhound is not the only British hound that has interested with us in this rebellion.

SEWARD'S cost of arms hereafter will be one forth rampant.

"WHAT is the reason that men never kiss each other, while the lads a waste a world of kisses on feminine lips?" said the regular to Gentle the other day.

Gentle cogitated a minute, and then answered:

"Because men must have something better to kiss, and women nothing else."

The explain: "Cos they can't get it."

A country Scotch friend of ours, who is not a member of the temperance society, being asked by a dealer to "name his price for old Uncle Peter," answered: "I tell you the truth, sir, I canna say I'm very fond of rum; for I'll talk nothing wae tumblers it's very apt to give a body the headache."

AN American editor thus describes in rhyme the patience of a husband with whom he's acquainted:

He never said a word,
But with a look of deepest melancholy
He sat, like patience, on an ottoman,
Waiting for his wife to put her bonnet on."

A GIRL who was making a dress put the sleeves in wrong. She was unable to change them, so she could not determine whether she had got the right sleeve in the wrong place, or the wrong sleeve in the right place.

THE late Lord Lyndhurst used to relate a characteristic circumstance, which occurred to him on circuit at Dolgelly, in Merionethshire. There was no prisoner to be tried, and the Lord Chief Baron expressed his surprise to the High Sheriff. That wise official actually stated that he had offended his lordship, and as it in concern for the honor of Merionethshire, assured him with fervor: "I can assure you that no which county has been in pursuit of a sheep-stealer!"

An Irishman dropped a letter into the post-office the other day, with the following memorandum in the corner, for the benefit of all postmasters into whose hands it might fall: "Dear brothers on the east side."

"WHERE'S I go," said a Yankee gentleman, remarkable for his stage grits, "I am sure to find some person from my own state."

"No wonder," said the gentleman whom he was addressing; "for any man of that side, who has any sense, leaves it as fast as he can."

A GENTLEMAN, who recently traveled over a mountain road, was asked by a native, on his return, whether road in the country, as the rape intendent knew a boy running out of the house, with a rope in one hand and sheep!

KATE was talking glowingly about love affairs. "That's strange!" exclaimed Charlie, her sweetheart, "I thought love could be associated with apples!" On the contrary, I thought that love could be associated with apples!" Kate replied approvingly.

"It is impossible," said one politician to another, "to say when your party ends and the opposition party begins."

"Well, sir," replied the other, "all you were riding a horse, I should say that it would be very difficult to tell where the head and the donkey began."

SHOOTING A COMA.—When out shooting in Texas, when a deer is wounded, it is usual to give a boss-acsanction, lying coiled up in a state of torpor, in search of a long chase, and then a glorious death. As I was in the lowlands at the time, a sandy state of affairs prevailed, and the country was full of coiled snakes in rapid succession into the embrace of his coils. He then carefully approached and, taking aim at the head of the boss, evidently hard hit. He immediately jumped down from the saddle, and, before he was halfway in, laid an embargo on his tail; but notwithstanding the efforts of the snake to get away, he was soon dead. He threw himself in, slipping out of our grasp with astonishing rapidity. We immediately took to examine the snake, and found that he had succeeded upon an elephant for mouse and plans, and secured upon an elephant for dinner. Before he could swallow the whole of the elephant he was choked to death by the swelling of the body, our friend out of his fear; but the trouble we saved us a good deal of trouble. The snake was about 20 feet in length, with an inquest of vultures sitting on him. We measured [illegible] snakes, which were found in the part of his body was two feet in girth. The vultures afterwards feasted on the snake, and I could not prevent it. I may mention that on this occasion my nor and three companions had to walk home, a distance of two pigs, and our late constitutor—my best dog's sport was spoiled.

A FEAST IN BONGO.—A Mr. Boyle has lately been traveling in Bongo, where he received great hospitality from the native chiefs. One of these, called Mr. Boyle and his brother to a mighty feast. During this feast several of the gallants were killed, and the Court dress of English Consuls general. His head was adorned by the hair by of a dragoon's head, secured by a linen band under his chin, whilst the horsetail plume waved over his left ear. The rest of the costume was quite in accordance with the victories in which one of their Majesty's Consuls had been engaged. On his stomach was the plated cover of a soup tureen, with a large silver spoon for a sword belt. His waist was the two brightest jewel among Gaudy's regalia, and on either thigh was a large silver dish-cover, suspended by a chain, which completed the costume in absence of cuirass. The festivity, which lasted for two days, was kept up with great spirit. The dancing was of the most disgusting as drunk as he possibly could. The drink by which the chiefs were intoxicated is described as being quite like thin milk, and is said that 600 of negroes drank in a day, and were not drunk. Mr. Boyle suggests the idea of cocoa-nut milk gone sour, mixed with water, as the probable origin of the drink; but states a suspicion of "cocoa, mingled with the strongest cayenne," when fresh gin was added. He also realizes the sensation of "waiting for the crisis in a rolling vessel at the equator," and considers that description is certainly fearful, and tends to suggest the idea that intermittent intoxication for three days must have an pleasant consequences.

VOICE.—It is stated by Scoresby and other acute voyagers, that whales possess, in their organs, some mysterious mode of conveyo with one another at a distance of many leagues, so that a whole shoal is rapidly communicated, and this without any sound audible to human ears. Dogs, also, have evidently an unknown mode of signaling through the medium of the air, which is not heard by human ears, but is as much by that on whole sagacity follows in a grever degree than that of the animal which utters the sound. The dog, the whale, and therefore the human race, although quite within the auditory range of the wind, must have other and more delicate organs for the mutually mean any voluntary and determinate sound given forth as a means of communication, whether the vocal organs be internal, as in the higher animals or external, as they probably are in the lower.

Hats.

Is there any necessity, apart from fashion, for wearing hats? The ancient world did not always wear one, and was not a bit more afflicted with headache than the modern; half of the latter does not wear it. The Hindoo is forbidden to use one by his creed, and among the mass of the people the rule is carefully obeyed. Four hundred millions of people at least never cover the head voluntarily; neither do the charity-school boys of London; neither do European and American women of the higher class, unless we call a wisp of muslin, stiffened with a plait or two of straw, or a few inches of fine wire, covering. None of them suffer from its absence, and there is not a prior reason why a cylinder of buff-covered paper, which only covers the crown, which does not protect the neck, or the ears, or the eyes, or anything, except the mere top of the head, should add so greatly to the general health. It certainly adds nothing to comfort, for of all imbecile contrivances for impeding the traveler's progress in a wind, commend us to the hat, while it reduces us to the use of that still more annoying contrivance, an umbrella. Were it not for the hat, a good overcoat would be a perfect protection; but we must have umbrellas to save the fragile constructions which, at nine dollars a piece, are spoiled if they are dented, injured if a sharp wind strikes them, and utterly ruined by a pelting shower of rain. As to beauty, there have been head-dresses which improve men's appearance—the cap of maintenance does, and so does the sombrero—but the hat of civilization is an object of ridicule alike to the artist and the savage, to the great painter, who will only attempt it when thrown on one side, and the half-civilized man, who quite seriously nicknames the European who has conquered him the "thing who wears a hat," and feels that the epithet consoles him for subjugation. Cool we believe the stove-pipe is, or would be if it were white, cooler, probably, than any other covering, except a thick turban, but this is its sole advantage, and even this requires the qualification that in a hot day, or a hot climate, the hat is useless without some folds of muslin or linen falling over the neck. As for its universal use, it is used by about one-tenth of mankind, that tenth never uses it in boyhood in play-ground or the field, by the seaside or on the farm, at sea or in battle, when at ease or when abroad, or, in short, in any one position in which they can by possibility invent a good excuse for wearing anything else. That substitutes have not succeeded, we admit, but that is because all substitutes yet tried have been devised with a view to picturesque effect, and a picturesque head-dress does not accord with the unpicturesque body-dress of the day. But the failure of substitutes no more proves that the original is good, than the failure to cure cholera proves that cholera is a mild disease; all it shows is the deficient inventiveness of those who have attempted it.

EXTRAORDINARY SUCCESS OF
FRANK LESLIE'S
Chimney Corner
NEW FAMILY PAPER.
Over 100,000 Copies Sold
Of Nos. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more really subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled:

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 150 portraits of our most celebrated Generals, Statesmen and Civilians, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at a cost of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will transmit to future generations the men who have restored our great Union intact. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, the noble-hearted General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Tuesday in New York.

It is electrotyped, and back numbers can be had by ordering them of any News Agent.

CAUTION!

We would respectfully caution the public and our subscribers in the Western States against a woman styling herself Mrs. O. Loomis, who is in the habit of collecting subscriptions and receiving money for Publications. She is an impostor. We have no traveling agents.

The special American correspondent of the London Times has convinced himself, by careful inquiry, that the stories of the treatment of the Northern prisoners by the South were true. He has seen and conversed with victims of the South, and believes that in the Libby prison, close to Mr. Davis' house, the prisoners were literally starved, that boxes of food were sent by their friends, but the authorities refused to distribute them, and "the prisoners died from hunger in sight of plenty." At Andersonville, 15,000 Northern prisoners lie buried, all dead of fever and hunger, having been kept "on a piece of land, without even a tent to cover them, with a tropical sun beating on their heads, and without food enough given them to keep a dog alive." It is for punishing this, which he could have stopped by an order of a day, that says the writer, "the North hungers for the execution of Mr. DAVIS."

MR. GALE, who believes that he has discovered the secret of making gunpowder innocuous, has patented and revealed his plan. He mixes glass, ground very fine, with the powder in the proportion of four to one, and the powder will then have to be stirred with a red-hot poker without exploding. There is no hoaxing, he continues, about the facts, the only doubt being as to their value. Clearly the mixture will want five times the room of the powder, and even if that can be provided, two or three questions have to be answered. How long does the powder take to sift, and what must it be sifted through, powder being usually wanted in a hurry? Will the glass shake down from the ceiling of the ship, and will not the glaze of the powder be gradually injured, thus materially injuring its force? It is stated that the invention was tried, in 1835, by M. Piobert, a Frenchman, who employed fine sand, but was not found practically valuable.

A SOCIETY has been organized in London for the purpose of explorations in the Holy Land, to be conducted by men of the critical requirements of modern archæological science. Upwards of $10,000 have been subscribed, and Capt. Wilson, who has for sometime been engaged in the survey, and who has been delegated to superintend the explorations, has left for Jerusalem, via Alexandria and Nabalus, and will commence work in October. Capt. Wilson lately travelled across from the Mediterranean to the Dead Sea, and made the circumference, and found that the depression of the surface of the Dead Sea on the 12th of March, 1865, was 1,292 feet from the level of the ocean, as observed along the border of the Dead Sea. It was found that the level of the water at some period of the year, probably during the rainy season, demonstrates from its inches higher, which would make the first depression 1,298 feet. The depth was also learned from inquiry among the Bedouins, also from European residents in Palestine that during the early spring months the Dead Sea is from a lower by at least six feet; this would make the general depression to be as near as possible 1,296 feet. The precise depth was impossible of determining the relative level of the two seas were not plotted together. The Dead Sea was found by one to be 715 feet above the surface of the Mediterranean, by another to be 1,000 feet, and by another to be 1,446 feet lower; but the most recent is that now given, by the Duc de Luynes and Lieut. Lynch, and that also by the survey of Capt. Wilson's result in a very remarkable manner, considering that the result was obtained by two separate observations, and the calculations of them being 1,298 on the 7th of June, 1864, which is a total error only 12 feet from the truth, if we suppose the Dead Sea to be six feet low.

MEN are full of faults, and it would be very wonderful if women, with a worse education and fewer incentives to higmindedness than men have, were not, on the whole, patient, virtuous, blemished beings some people would have us suppose them. One can scarcely imagine a man being overtaken by calamity than a wife who harasses his soul with stupid jealousies or senseless reproaches, or wastes his substance in frivolous extravagance, or neglects his children or her children and her servants, and lets all things go to sheer ruin, whereby a husband of the kind whom no sense of obligation ever seems to touch, and whom in time not even a saint could continue to love, is driven to despair. Yet we have often wearied him to death with unreasonable jealousies. She refused to let him have needful sums of money, and squandered it on herself, and plunged it into the lape of the abandoned women. She refused him with all manner of courageous calumnies. She ran away from him, and ran away several times, until at last she was not asked to "come back," but was "never allowed, now, recorded," was Wesley's entry on the subject in his journal. Yet, on her tombstone at Camberwell, where she was set down that she was a woman of exemplary piety, a tender parent, and a sincere friend." This is always the case. Bad and odious men get a character for virtue, and even for the odious women, always provided they can produce bank "marriage lines" upon occasion, never fail to secure a character for piety, and many other particulars and gaining sycophantees. No doubt Mrs. Wesley had plenty of provocation, we believe that her husband was a hypocritical profligate, but that she was a shrew, a slattern, a scold, a slanderer, a wanderer, and a liar, and in many other outrageous virago-like fall to the lot of men who have not John Wesley's lofiness of spirit, or his purity and self-denials and power of self-control.

M. DUFS, Procureur-General of France, recently made a report in the Senate on Prostitution and its increase in the French capital and province, which he supported by a remarkable and plain-spoken speech. He boldly charged a large portion of the evil with which he and the committee, of which he was chairman, had to deal, upon the bad example set to the lower classes by what are called the higher classes of French society. Luxury in personal adornment, expensive dress, and the love of jewelry, he boldly accounted the stimulants of the evil. But M. Dupin did not inform the Senate (it would have been madness for him to do so, and, besides, his wholesome words would, in that case, never have gained publicity) that the blame of extravagance and luxury which now prevails among those of the higher circles in France who frequent the Imperial Court is chargeable upon the court itself. Such as the Emperor has dazzled the eyes and contented the appetite of the courtier by rebuilding Paris, and covering it with buildings which are splendid and pretentious without being artistic, so has the Empress Eugenia set the example of an unbounded and immense luxury in dress to the ladies of the Empire. George IV. invented mail-coaches; the Empress Eugenie invented crinoline—an invention which has already cost millions of money and a holocaust of human victims. It would be no exaggeration to say that the number of lives which have been sacrificed to that tremendous shrine of fashion, and which we may entirely lay at the Empress, at least equals the number of those which have been wasted upon the ambitious schemes of her husband. For years past it has been known that the lady visitors invited to Fontainbleau and St. Cloud have been required to provide themselves with dresses not only sufficient for a daily change, but for three changes every day, and no dress is accepted to make an appearance twice during the visit. The haberdashers, and dressmakers, of course, applaud this régime to the skies, just as the builders and stone-masons regard the Emperor and M. Haussmann as their Providence. But what is the result? In the latter case an immense increase of the National Debt; in the other, private ruin and accumulation of private debt. After condemning the fact that the committee had been a secret one, and so giving to the action of the Government with regard to the "unfortunate women" of Paris all shame on the one side and legalizing it on the other—M. Dupin spoke as follows:

"Before the yellow dress fell on duty, and from the top to the bottom of society it is impossible to say that the vice was confined to the higher classes, but we don't say but enough absent the higher classes, but we don't say but enough absent the higher classes. Those who are much seen are those who are much talked of. Were we to talk about the women who exhibit themselves in the Bois de Boulogne, in the Champs Elysées, and everywhere else display themselves in splendid carriages and attended by footmen in gorgeous liveries? What do we see in the highest circles of society? Do they not take pattern in the dress of ladies of the demi-monde? Do they not find the Phryne of the streets who sets an example to the fashionable world? The fashionable companion of the sale of photographs at five sous apiece. Go to your bookseller's, and you will find that there are more of the worse than the photographs of which they complain. Such is the present state of things, and I think it right to point out the higher classes, because examples descend from above to below, before they can ascend from below to above. Is it not plain that much of this evil arises from the unhappy position in which the lady comes in fashion with regard to dress? The wealthiest men in the world cannot, if we are to believe the statements or revelations of tradesmen's bills which she is good enough to communicate to her husband, satisfy her unbridled desires. Those examples I copied by the interior of society. Then, in order to satisfy these desires, the lady of fashion determines to dress like her neighbor. In the case of the wife of his fellow, we have seen that the husband, being too ashamed to make himself as big as an ox, has been known to run away from his creditors, before they could do so. The dog has only to put a crinoline around his body, and the husband's position is at an end. When a woman wishes to exhibit herself at a fête, and to be admired, she knows that she is sure to be so if she can only manage to get, self-love carries the day. She knows that the husband's position is at stake, but she does not concern herself upon trust, she signs bills and promissory notes, and the husband is ruined. Such is the origin of a notion which is inevitably laid to her virtue. Such, unfortunately, is the origin of the greater part of the evil which surrounds us. Where there are no moralsthere are no laws. Where there are no laws there are no sentences. For my part, I should like to see many of the unfortunate mothers of families who are without a bestowing the graces of costume, or even the graces of the face. Such a female then, would be a fine example of denying themselves the useless and ruinous luxury which is by that means, rendered ridiculous. The evil effects of a bad example these other classes of society have to suffer in their turn, and there would be a summit which they have not strength to attain."

THE London Spectator, noticing the reply of Mr. Johnson, to the representation made by the Virginians against the $50,000 exemption clause in their Constitution, says of the President elect:

"The Virginians, as they retired, must have realized, that in Mr. Johnson they had encountered and done for them, when he mastered Mr. Stephens. Mr. Johnson is a man who has the will to be a king, bound to restrain his will, a regicide, a man who normally constructs, by the power of a resolute will, with the ideas of Brutus, the political world around him. He is also a man of the people, and has the strength and the vulnerability democratists. The bitterest abolitionist in the country could not have chosen a fitter Minister of Reconstruction than the man who, when Governor of Tennessee, was the only Southern notable in the whole country who refused to secede, and who, when a Southern secession has placed at the head of affairs."

THE secession press of London cannot give up its system of the misrepresentation of the North, even now when the misrepresentation can be of no service to anybody. It seems to be growing into an incredible habit. Thus, the Saturday Review says, concerning the state of the war, endeavors to glorify bravery, and fearlessness of exposure by ensuring the number of Southern Generals killed in the war, and concludes that the North are of Northern officers. "Very few Northern Generals," it says, "now, we believe, holding a high command, have been killed or wounded in battle; Grant, Lyon and Kearney being among the rare exceptions." Of course the Saturday Review never heard of Sedgwick, Wadsworth, Stevens, Reynolds, Barry, and the dozens of others who sealed their devotion to the Union with their blood.

THE London Athenæum opens a notice of "The Life and Correspondence, by Charles F. Bidwell, British Vice-Consul at Panama," as follows: "We are rather in doubt, and quite ready to concede the benefit of it to Mr. Bidwell, whether the author means to be facetious or not, when in the introduction he tells us that he understands nothing about biography, and that Vice-Consul Bidwell might have been quite easy on that point. Considering that this is his first attempt in the book line, and that it is cut and cold paces, and goodbody taken from other authors, with acknowledgment, and of the remainder a good many without acknowledgment, we think he shows a dexterity in the use of scissors and paste, of which, under proper cultivation, great things may yet be expected."

From the list of Decembrists to the 1st of May, 1865, there were 110 fires in the city—the largest loss was over $2,000,000, insurance $1,000,000—the total amount of insurance paid was $1,370,000.

TOWN GOSSIP.

DICKENS says in one of his lively novels, "that three consecutive fine days drives bachelors to matrimony" or as some phrase it, "the existence of a great fine cause." It must be confessed that nothing can be more trying to a business man's nerves than to sit hour after hour waiting for a fare, "worse" of fare even the single, wherein with his bat in the water without cracking any hats, he has yet to endure the slight excitement of a nibble. Now what these consecutive fine days did for a drowned religion, three consecutive days in New York without some monster deliverance has done for so-called honest begin to believe in the honesty of Wall street. Yes, reader, it is a fact, we have had the world reverse on its axis several times, and it has not come down, nor has either a Rothschild or a Jenkins. Of course, we have not the gift of foresight, and what the next monster revolution will be, God only knows, Father Time, may do, we cannot say; perhaps make amends for lost time, and give us detailers by the dozen. Apropos of Jenkins, we notice that the worst delinquencies, defaces of the New York bar has been displayed in the case of the "greasy water girl," who has been discharged from custody, while that nameless animal, between whom and "hell" she confessed "a limited friendship" existed, has been most properly remanded to prison. That he worked upon the fears of that poor unfortunate girl, and induced her to commit some folly after she possess it—that the best person in the world to watch over his diseased villainy would be his fair inamorata. Frank Leslie's Budget of Fun, for October, has a most amusing article on philosophically, and at full length noted in commercial and domestic circles—it comes do better than read what it says on that subject.

We have also been favored with advance sheets from the publishers of a summer resume. The sudden and unexpected change in the weather has not sent the bulletins home. As we write this in one of the pleasant parties of the United World we see several of the fair sex in the street car drive away, and adding the most genial evidence to that best par excellence, Warren's preparation for the complexion, that it must be considered even more all since what the Semilles were to the Roman Empire, we are to be surprised.

Another unpleasant topic of the week has been the prevailing mode of murder, namely, the "refined" mode. Not content with numerous other ways of shuffling off the mortal coil if a man is absolutely beat upon and kicked to death, or shot down in the street by cowardens, whose natural arguments are revolvers, or taking poison, as the last resource, which is an invitation to all the neighboring rowdies to insult you, or your dear partheirs out if you venture to object. As for punishment, that is a thing of the sentimental past, and as for the ruffians a dollar, and let them go, with the advice "not to do it again." Such is the present state of affairs, and a regular prejudice against murder and outrage!" Don't smile, reader, this really occurred at a little tourney the other day, not a thousand miles from Jersey City, when Albany comely took possession of the place, robbed the safe, and carried off the women, and shot several citizens and when some of them were captured, they were discharged on bail, and on a fine of $10!

The theatres have been closed all week, as they deserved to be. The Keans at the Academy, Barnum's unrivaled attractions, and the Winter Garden, with its troupe are always novelty and attraction for all classes. "Arch master" Forrest has returned from a tour in Italy, which it deserves to do, since both dramatist and manager have done their best to make an excellent acting play. The new play is entitled Nicholas Nickleby, from the Periwinkle Letter, commences a series of thirty nights at the Academy of Music, and will doubtless fill every night. We regret that all the tickets he will introduce are entirely now; there are said to be very interesting, especially those relating to speech, and which are supposed to be President Johnson as a radical Secretary of the Treasury—that is to say, if we mean to resume speech agreements.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—The President has ordered the commencement of active operations in the Treasury Department. Mr. Sharkey is constituted as provisional Governor.

Postmaster Gen. Dennison declines being a candidate for the Governorship of Ohio.

—Col. J. J. Siebels, of Montgomery, Ala., died in the Tombs on the morning of August. He was sent as Minister to Belgium, and was a Douglas man in 1860—but a Southern man to the last. He never gave all his efforts to promote reconstruction.

—The steamer Metamora, of August, passenger train on the Norwich Railroad was thrown from the track near Hartford, Conn., running over a cow—about 11 persons were injured.

—Immediately the government has closed all the machine shops in Norfolk, and discharged all the workmen.

—The Postmaster has ordered the resumption of mail trains to Richmond.

—In the Province of the 23d of August, Mr. Horace Greeley delivered a speech, in which he said "I now see that God's way was better than any that I contemplated."

—The Fenian movement is becoming so great a nuisance, by reason of correspondence with Ireland, as to be the subject of Parliamentary discussion to meet this growing evil.

—The Confederation of Jamaica has called considerable attention to the cash accounts of the bank-tellers, and also to the bank-notes of the country. Several of the latter have been found deficient, and of these the counterfeit amounts to upwards of $200,000.

—A new and unused Gladstone recently obtained from the proprietor of the Bleecker street Hotel, New York, by a forged order, released banks and other valuable securities to the amount of $240,000. Seven men are arrested from the various parties in whose hands the bonds have been found, and held to bail.

—The Surgeon Appears have resolved to call the first town built in the South after the late lamented Lincoln, in honor of our martyred President.

—Gen. Wade Hampton, formerly Governor of the State, died on Sunday, the 8th of August, in his 44 year.

—Brevet Brevet, aged only 27, has been committed for trial for the murder of his two wives in four years.

—Fredrick Seward has so much improved from the late fracture of his skull, that his ultimate recovery is proved beyond even rumour his duties as Assistant Secretary of State.

—A Northern firm has leased Jamestown Island in James river, and are preparing for cotton culture.

—It is stated that the colored troops will soon be mustered out of service.

—Genevieve Lyons, the pretty yorker girl, was discharged in custody on the 31st of August, there being no evidence to hold her. She had been in prison three days for the same offence. Bravo, her butcher friend was, however, remanded to the Tombs.

—Col. J. J. Morrison, whose portrait we published in vol. xx., has been appointed Brigadier-General for the colored service. He has returned with his regiment, 16th N. Y. Heavy artillery, and carefully disbanded in summers. They entered the service 2,000 strong.

—An English officer, Col. Fremantle, has been intelligent to the excellent treatment our Union prisoners received from rank wretches as Wirz, against whom rank atrocities have been proved that a true would seem superfluous, except for the sake of mere legal form. Col. Fremantle shows how little his veracity is worth, since, after testifying to the kindness of the rebels towards our unhappy men, he says: "The Federal authorities let the rebel prisoners rot on Johnson's Island."

—— The banking-house of Cole, Sumner & Co., of La Crosse, Wisconsin, has suspended payment, in consequence of the Ketchum frauds.

—— The census of Chicago has just been completed—she contains 177,956 inhabitants.

—— Mr. Knight, formerly landlord of the Sewell House, Broadway, who was crushed under the ruins of the wall of the St. Charles Hotel on the 7th of August, died on the 24th of August.

—— An amusing incident occurred on the Detroit railroad; an officer, who was conveying a female prisoner from Saginaw on the cars, had occasion to go into another car for a short time. The conductor coming along in the meantime, not knowing she was a prisoner, asked her for her fare, which she refusing to pay, he had the train stopped, and the woman put off. The annoyance of the policeman can be imagined when he discovered that his bird had escaped.

—— The trial of the rebel Governor of Andersonville Prison-pen, is now proceeding in Washington. Even the rebel surgeon who superintended the place, declares, that but for this man's incredible barbarity, 75 per cent. of the deaths might have been prevented—in other words, three-fourths of over 11,000 persons were murdered by this monster.

—— We notice a case of rapid justice in Boston. On the night of the 13th of August, four ruffians, named Van Weimer, Northridge, Shay and Dolan, outraged a woman. On the 23d of August they were tried, committed and sentenced to imprisonment for life.

—— The gunboat Donegal, which arrived in New York on the 24th of August, reports, that while towing the steamer Commodore McDonough from Port Royal, the latter sprung a leak on the 23d of August, and was abandoned full of water. The crew was all saved by the Donegal.

—— A meeting was held in Jersey City on the 24th of August, to adopt measures to prevent the dumping of garbage in the public ways.

—— Railroad accidents are becoming the rule, and not the exception. On the 24th of August there was a collision between a passenger and freight train, on the Oil Creek Railroad, near Titusville, by which nine persons were killed and 17 wounded; and on the 23d of August an excursion train, filled with passengers, returning to Boston from a picnic party, at Abingdon, on the Old Colony Railroad, came in collision with a hand-car on the track, in which were two men. The engine, baggage, smoking, and four passenger cars were thrown from the track, three of the latter being capsized down an embankment. They contained nearly 150 passengers, including many ladies, who were taken out through the windows. Wonderful to say, only seven were hurt, and none of them seriously. The cars, however, were badly shattered.

—— A "mountain of silver," or at all events a mountain containing vast quantities of the metal, has been discovered in the new State of Nevada. Its name is Silver Peak, it is east of San Francisco and about 70 miles south of Austin, and 12 immensely rich lodes have already been opened. The whole of Nevada is rich in silver, but this particular spot will, it is believed, produce more than any mines yet discovered. Close to the peak is an extinct crater, near it a vast deposit of salt, within sight a hill of pure sulphur, and around an endless stony desert, the whole scene suggesting strongly the picture which Milton drew of hell.

—— Edward B. Ketchum, accused of forging gold checks to a large amount, was on the 25th of August arrested, near the house, No. 223 West 20th street, where, it appears, he has been concealed ever since the forgeries became known. The sum of $48,000 was found in his possession. Ketchum takes his arrest very coolly. During Saturday he had interviews with the different members of his family. District Attorney Hall has entered a complaint against him, on behalf of the people, at the First District Police Court. The date for the examination of the case, has not yet been fixed. Some correspondence was found in Ketchum's possession, which seems to implicate other parties.

Foreign.—The twenty-sixth annual report of the Registrar-General of births, deaths, and marriages in England has been issued. From this we learn that 347,000 persons married, 727,417 children were born, and 473,837 persons died during the past year. With regard to marriages, the Registrar-General informs us that the cotton famine of 1861 and 1862 was reflected at once in the registers, and that the rate, which in 1860 was so high as 1·710 persons married to every 100 persons living, fell to 1·628 in 1861, and further to 1·614 in 1862. In 1863 the crisis had passed, the good harvest encouraged marriages, and the proportion to every 100 persons living rose to 1·683, while the average of the last twenty years was 1·640.

—— On the 17th instant, a German author, living at Stuttgart, a Dr. Dulk, swam from Romanshorn to Friedrichshafen, a distance of about twelve miles, in six hours and a half.

—— It appears that the occupants of the 40 chairs of the Académie Française count amongst them no less than five octogenarians, ten septuagenarians, and 13 sexagenarians. The oldest member on the list is M. Viennet, who was born in 1777, and is, consequently, in the 88th year of his age; the next in seniority are M. de Ségur, 85; M. de Barante, 83; M. Lupin, 82; M. Lebrun, 80; M. Guizot, 78; the Duc de Broglie, 76; M. Villemain, M. de Lamartine, M. Empis, and M. Berryer, each 75; M. de Pongerville, and M. Cousin, 73; M. Patni, 72; M. Flourens, 71. The youngest member of the academy, as well as the last elected, is M. Prévost Paradol, aged 36.

—— The famous rose-tree, planted 1,000 years ago, by the Emperor Louis le Débonnaire, in the eastern choir of the cathedral at Hildersheim, has been in particularly fine bloom this season, and looks fresher and greener than ever. Two shoots, which sprang up from the motty millennial roots of the tree in 1863, have attained already the height of the roof.

—— A stringent law for the abolition of slavery is to be brought into the Portuguese Cortes. That is good, but if the king will hang the first colonial governor who breaks it that will be better. Even Southern slavery was endurable compared with the system which prevails in the Portuguese colonies, where one of the lowest of races wields absolute power made cruel by the fear of resistance.

—— A great battle has been fought on the Parana, the grand South American river, commonly called from the name of its estuary, the Plata. Lopez, the Dictator of Paraguay, has declared war on Brazil and the Argentine Confederation, and on 11th of June his fleet, consisting of eight steamers and six flat boats, attacked the Brazilian fleet of nine gunboats off Corrientes. The Paraguayans were assisted by a heavy battery on shore and fought splendidly, but after a combat of 15 hours they were defeated, losing all their flats, all but three of their steamers, and 1,700 men. The Brazilians also suffered greatly, losing 19 officers and 300 men, and most of their steamers being rendered useless. Lopez, moreover, has an army below them which is erecting batteries on the river, and it is quite possible that the Brazilians may not be able to descend. One Paraguayan army still occupies Corrientes, and another has entered the Brazilian province of Rio Grande, and taken Boria. It is asserted that had Lopez won the engagement he would have been master of the whole valley of the Plate, have founded an empire, and decreed the summary extinction of slavery in Brazil.

HUMAN LIFE.—Hope writes the poetry of a boy, but memory that of a man. Man looks forward with smiles, but backward with sighs. Such is the wise providence of heaven. The cup of life is sweeter at the brim, the flavor is impaired as we drink deeper, and the dregs are made bitter that we may not struggle when it is taken from our lips.

A BATTALION OF THE 71ST NEW YORK REGIMENT IN BOSTON.

A BATTALION of the 71st regiment of New York, consisting of Companies B and H, numbering 123 men, under command of Capt. A. M. Underhill, and accompanied by Dodworth's band, paid a visit to Boston on the 16th of August. The command left the city of New York on the evening of the 15th by the steamer Metropolis, and breakfasted on the boat at Newport. They arrived in Boston shortly before eleven o'clock, on the second train from Newport, and were escorted from the depot by the Fusileers, where they were introduced to his honor Mayor Lincoln, who welcomed them in a speech, which was replied to by Capt. Underhill. In the afternoon they partook of a dinner at the American Hotel, after which they visited the Charlestown Navy Yard, Bunker Hill, and other points of interest.

FLOWER INFLUENCE.

I SAW the young flowers rise
Last May, on Southern hills
And by Virginian rills,
A thousand heavenly eyes;
And I forgot the slain
Who there might once have lain.

But while they gave me joy
There came no whispered word
From flowers my feet that stirred—
"A prison murdered boy—
Thy brother—lieth low
Where our sweet kindred grow."

I know it now; and when
I marched with solemn tread,
Where Spring her train hath spread,
O'er Southern slopes again,
More sternly I will long
To strike, and crush the wrong.

A NIGHT OF TERROR.

IN the fall of 1846, I was traveling eastward in a stage-coach from Pittsburg over the mountains. My fellow-passengers were two gentlemen and a lady. The elder gentleman's appearance interested me exceedingly. In years he seemed about thirty; in air and manner he was calm, dignified and polished; and the contour of his features was singularly intellectual. He conversed freely on general topics, until the road became more abrupt and precipitous; but on my directing his attention to the great altitude of a precipice, on the verge of which our coach wheels were leisurely rolling, there came a marked change over his countenance. His eyes, so lately filled with the light of mild intelligence, became wild, restless and anxious; the mouth twitched spasmodically, and the forehead beaded with a cold perspiration. With a sharp, convulsive shudder, he turned his gaze from the giddy height, and clutching my arm tightly with both hands, he clung to me like a drowning man.

"Use this cologne," said the lady, handing me a bottle, with the instinctive goodness of her sex.

I sprinkled a little on his face, and he soon became somewhat more composed; but it was not until we had traversed the mountain and descended to the country beneath, that his fine features relaxed from their perturbed look, and assumed the placid, quiet dignity I had first noticed.

"I owe an apology to the lady," said he, with a bland smile and gentle inclination of the head to our fair companion, "and some explanation to my fellow-travelers also, and perhaps I cannot better acquit myself of the double debt, than by recounting the cause of my recent agitation."

"It may pain your feelings," delicately urged the lady.

"On the contrary, it will relieve them," was the respectful reply.

Having signified our several desires to hear more, the traveler thus proceeded:

At the age of eighteen I was light of heart, light of foot, and I fear (here he smiled) light of head. A fine property on the right bank of the Ohio acknowledged me as sole owner. I was hastening home to enjoy it, and delighted to get free from a college life. The month was October; the air was bracing, and the mode of conveyance a stage-coach like this, only more cumbrous. The other passengers were few—but three in all—an old gray-headed planter of Louisiana, his daughter, a joyous, bewitching creature about seventeen, and his son, about ten years of age. They were just returning from France, of which the young lady discoursed in terms so eloquent, as to absorb my entire attention.

The father was taciturn, but the daughter was vivacious by nature, and we soon became so mutually pleased with each other, she as a talker, I as a listener, that it was not until a sudden flash of lightning, and a heavy dash of rain against the coach-windows elicited an observation from my charming companion, that I noticed how night passed on. Presently there was a low, rumbling sound, and then several tremendous peals of thunder, accompanied by successive flashes of lightning. The rain descended in torrents, and an angry wind began to howl and moan by turns through the forest trees.

I looked from the window of our vehicle. The night was dark as ebony, but the lightning revealed the danger of our road. We were on the edge of a frightful precipice. I could see at intervals, huge jutting rocks far away down on the sides, and the sight made me solicitous for the fate of my fair companion. I thought of the mere hair-breadths that were between us and eternity; a single little rock in the track of our coach wheels, a tiny billet of wood, a stray limb of a tempest-torn tree, a restive horse, or a careless driver—any of these might hurl us from our sublunary existence with the speed of thought.

"'Tis a perfect tempest," said the lady, as I withdrew my head from the window. "How I love a sudden storm. There is something so grand among the winds when fairly loose among the hills. I never encounter a night like this, but Byron's magnificent description of a thunder-storm in the Jura immediately recurs to my mind. But are we on the mountains yet?"

"Yes, we have begun the ascent."

"Is it not said to be dangerous?"

"By no means," I replied, in as easy a tone as I could assume.

"I only wish it was daylight, that we might enjoy the mountain scenery. But, Jesu Maria! what's that?"

And she covered her eyes from the glare of a sheet of lightning that illumined the rugged mountain with brilliant intensity. Peal after peal of crashing thunder instantly succeeded; there was a very volume of rain coming down at each thunder-burst, and with the deep moaning of an animal, as if in dreadful agony, breaking upon my ears, I found that the coach had come to a dead halt.

Louise, my beautiful fellow-traveler, became pale as ashes. She fixed her searching eyes on mine with a look of anxious dread, and turning to her father, hurriedly remarked:

"We are on the mountains!"

"I reckon so," was the unconcerned reply.

With instant activity, I put my head through the window, and called to the driver, but the only answer was the heavy moaning of an agonized animal borne past me by the swift wings of the tempest. I seized the handle of the door and strained at it in vain; it would not yield a jot. At that instant I felt a cold hand on mine, and heard Louise's voice faintly articulating in my ear, the appalling words:

"The coach is being moved backwards!"

God in Heaven! never shall I forget the fierce agony with which I tugged at that coach door, and called on the driver in tones that rivaled the force of the blast, while the dreadful conviction was burning in my brain that the coach was being moved slowly backwards!

What followed was of such swift occurrence, that it seems to me like a frightful dream.

I rushed against the door with all my force, but it mocked my utmost efforts. One side of our vehicle was sensibly going down, down. The moaning of the agonized animal became deeper, and deeper, and I knew from the desperate plunges against his traces, that it was one of our horses. Crash upon crash of hoarse thunder rolled over the mountain, and vivid sheets of lightning played around our devoted carriage, as if in glee at our misery. By its light I could see for a moment—only for a moment—the old planter standing erect, with his hands on his son and daughter, his eyes raised to heaven, and his lips moving like those of one in prayer. I could see Louise turn her ashy cheeks and superb eyes towards me, as if imploring my protection; and I could see the bold glance of the young boy flashing indignant defiance at the descending carriage, the war of elements, and the awful danger that awaited him. There was a roll of thunder, a desperate plunge, as if of an animal in the last throes of dissolution, a harsh grating jar, a sharp, piercing scream of mortal terror, and I had but time to clasp Louise firmly with one hand round the waist, and seize the leather fastenings attached to the coach roof with the other, when we were precipitated over the precipice.

I can distinctly recollect preserving consciousness, for a few seconds of time, how rapidly my breath was being exhausted; but of that tremendous descent, I soon lost all further individual knowledge by a concussion so violent that I was instantly deprived of sense and motion.

The traveler paused. His features worked for a minute or two, as they did while we were on the mountain; he pressed his hands across his forehead, as if in pain, and then resumed his interesting story:

On an humble couch, in an humble room, of a small country house, I next opened my eyes in this world of light and shade, of joy and sorrow, of mirth and madness; gentle hands smoothed my pillow, gentle feet glided across my chamber, and a gentle voice hushed for a while all my questionings. I was kindly tended by a fair young girl about sixteen, who refused for several days to hold any intercourse with me. At length, one morning, finding myself sufficiently recovered to sit up, I insisted on learning the result of the incident.

"You were discovered," said she, "sitting on a ledge of rock, amidst the branches of a shattered tree, clinging to a part of the roof of your broken coach with one hand, and to the insensible form of a lady with the other."

"And the lady," I gasped, scanning the girl's face, with an earnestness that caused her to draw back and blush.

"She was saved, sir, by the same means that saved you—the friendly tree."

"And her father and brother?" I impatiently demanded.

"Were both found crushed to pieces at the bottom of the precipice, a great way below the place where my father and Uncle Joe got you and the lady. We buried their bodies in one grave, close by the clover patch down in our meadow ground."

"Poor Louise! Poor Orphan! God pity you!" I muttered, in broken tones, utterly unconscious that I had a listener.

"God pity her, indeed, sir," said the young girl, with a gush of heartfelt sympathy. "Would you like to see her?" she added.

"Take me to her," I replied.

I found the orphan bathed in tears, by the grave of her buried kindred. She received me with sorrowful sweetness of manner. I will not detain your attention, by detailing the efforts I made to win her from her great grief, but briefly acquaint you that I at last succeeded in inducing her to leave her forlorn home in the South; and that twelve months after the dreadful occurrence which I have related, we stood at the altar together as man and wife. She still lives to bless my love with her smiles, and my children with her good precepts; but on the anniversary of that terrible night, she secludes herself in her room, and devotes the hours of darkness to solitary prayer.

"As for me," added the traveler, while a faint flush tinged his noble brow at the avowal, "as for me, that accident has made a physical coward of me, at the sight of a mountain precipice."

"But the driver," urged our lady passenger, who had attended to the recital of the story with much attention; "what became of the driver? or did you ever learn the reason of his deserting his post?"

"His body was found on the road, within a few yards of the spot where the coach went over. He had been struck dead by the same flash of lightning that blinded the restive horse."

The traveler here fell into a musing attitude, as if further allusion to the subject would be unpleasing to him. Shortly after this we reached the railroad station, where I parted with my fellow-passenger with feelings of profound esteem.

A RATTLESNAKE STORY.

WE have hitherto supposed the day long since passed for chronicling a big snake fight in the vicinity of the Central City, but such, it appears, is not the case, from a scene which recently transpired within a short drive from the Court-house. Some of the older residents will remember a building which formerly stood on Prospect Hill, about six miles distant from Peoria, and which was destroyed some seven or eight years since. During the past season another house was erected near the same locality, and all that remained as relics of the old hotel was a partially filled excavation for a cellar and two well-preserved brick cisterns, which had been kept covered up. Last week, the proprietor of the place, while busy with his wife in preparing their summer flower-garden, found himself in want of a few bricks for the edge of the walks. Remembering the cisterns, he uncovered one of them, and finding it dry at the bottom, and only about six feet in depth, he jumped in, and commenced throwing out some of the best bricks he could pick from the walls. It seems there was a piece of plank, with one end partially embedded in the earth, that somewhat incommoded him, so, seizing it with some exertion, he pulled it out and threw it to the top. What was his horror and surprise at the next moment to find that he had unearthed an enormous rattlesnake, and himself without a weapon in his hand! As the cistern was round, and only about five feet in diameter, he could not jump out; and the snake, bristling with anger and rattling defiance, was ready for battle. His screams brought his wife to the scene; but she was so overcome with fright that she became powerless to render assistance. The snake, in the meantime, had commenced the fight, making repeated springs at him, but fortunately he managed, on each occasion, to to hit him upon the head with his boot, without receiving a bite, the snake all the time becoming more defiant and enraged. During the whole scene, which lasted several minutes, the man did not lose his presence of mind, but, watching his chance, made several frantic efforts to jump bodily from this seeming pit of destruction. At the last trial he fortunately grasped a brick, which gave way with him, and remained in his hand as he again stood fronting his hissing enemy. After a few more kicks, and watching his opportunity, he fired it, making, probably, one of the best shots on record, for it struck the snake on the head, and between the one sent and the wall he he became a "pretty well used-up sarpint." Weak and exhausted, our hero, by the assistance of his wife, was enabled to climb from the pit, but when once more upon the earth he fainted away, and it was some time before he recovered. For several succeeding days he was very unwell, owing, probably, to the poisonous effluvia inhaled, while his desperate exercise in the encounter rendered him extremely lame. The snake was afterwards taken from the cistern, when it was found to measure seven feet in length, and contained thirteen rattles.

FRETFULNESS.—Fretfulness is a great lender of misery. It begins its loans to very young borrowers; and there is great danger that if its debtors draw on it early they will become sad spendthrifts of misery, and scarcely ever be able to free themselves from the clutches of their hard task-master and creditor. There is nothing more successful in making people unnecessarily miserable than a fretful, discontented spirit. It works ill in two ways; it causes its victims to think badly of themselves, and (what is worse) to think badly of other people too. Fretfulness and peevishness are very much under our own control. Men can choose to what extent they will permit circumstances to have influence over them, and the character of that influence.

An eccentric person, of the Johnsonian school, has made a sort of fable on this subject. He maintains that all kinds of weather may be made charming to a man if he so will; that if he will go out in the rain, without any defence, and pretend to know nothing about the showers, the rain will cease for him, each drop exclaiming, "It is no use raining upon that man, he does not mind it."

There is a moral to that fable: and we may be sure that, if instead of allowing every slight incident in personal, social, or family life to ruffle our tempers and make us wretched, we were determined to regard fewer of them, the wear and tear of life would be much less, and days and hours would pass more pleasantly. In every house, every day, there are trival circumstances which, if dwelt upon, will cause trouble for a long time, but which are so small that they should never be noticed.

Said Cervantes, "Hast thou a mind to quarrel with thy wife? Bid her bring water to thee in the sunshine; a very fair quarrel may be picked about motes in the clearest water."

Yes; great misery—all borrowed, none of it necessary—is brought to families by the fretful, captious, querulous scoldings that occur every day; by the ridiculous, persecuting, vixenish notice taken of paltry things at home. Fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters! If our homes are to be happy, joyous places, hunt out more fretfulness, and make the love borne by one to the other as considerate to mutual weakness as is the courtesy that is paid to strangers.

THE COLOR OF BIRDS.—Color is intended not merely for beauty; it is, in fact, a mode of concealment, the most universal of all means of defence, and one that appears in every race of animals. As the strength, the weapons, and the velocity are all on the pursuer, color is much more resorted to for the defence of birds than of any other creatures. In the partridge, the quail, the woodcock, and the snipe, the likeness of their colors to the brown earth on which they move, is such as often to conceal them from every eye, not excepting the piercing sight of the hawk or the kite. The hovering foe may be observed above during the chase, though the victim has not escaped, deceived also by smaller birds, even when the accordance in color is not great. Often do they shift their position under the eye of the hawk, eager to pounce upon them, and then stop, as if, as White says, "they knew the color of the spot upon which they were cowering and squatting was a sure defence."

A LADY on the grand stand at the Saratoga races told a newspaper correspondent that she had $28,000 worth of diamonds in her hair; that she felt perfectly "safe," as no pickpockets were admitted within the gates, and her husband had put a policeman behind her with nothing else to do but see that her diamond head suffered no violation.

THE SUPPLY OF PEACHES FROM NEW JERSEY FOR THE NEW YORK MARKETS.—From Sketches by our Special Artist, Mr. J. E. Taylor.

A PEACH ORCHARD AT CRANBERRY, N. J.—PICKING PEACHES.

THE PEACH TRADE.

THE traffic in peaches in the metropolis has grown to be of an extensive and interesting character. The principal trade is carried on with New Jersey, where the fruit is grown in orchards of from 1,000 to 45,000 trees each. They are in season for about two months, from July 20 to September 20. During that time, probably an average of 50 car-loads a day, at 600 baskets per car, pours from the West and South into New York, either to be eaten in the city or re-shipped to the East and North. About one-third is thus re-shipped; and some of the fruit goes as far as to Canada and New Brunswick. The New Jersey crop this year is rather short, particularly of the yellow sorts, and the deficiency is made up from the crops of Delaware and Maryland.

The prices charged this year by the commission dealers in New York city, may be roughly named at from $1 25 to $1 75 per basket (of somewhat over half-a-bushel); though very poor and very superior samples have brought only 50 cents, or as much as $2 50. Thus the New York peach business comes to a total of about 1,000,000 baskets, for which the commission merchants receive at least $1,500,000, and the retailers a good deal more.

In the illustrations which accompany this article, our Artist has afforded graphic and well-chosen views of interesting eras in the career of the peach.

Among the localities in New Jersey where peaches are raised, may be named Flemington, Hightstown, Rocky Hill, Millstein, Trenton and Cranberry, of which our Artist has selected the last as the subject of his sketch. We might very greatly increase he list.

The fruit is ready for picking just a little before it is dead ripe, for it must be hard enough to endure the necessary transportation by railroad. It is picked by hand, usually on the day before that on which it enters New York; if of even quality, is bunched without assorting; is, however, sorted if necessary, and after each basket is covered with a coarse cloth, sewed on all round the top, the farmers consignment is carried by wagon away to the nearest railroad station. Here, if business is sufficiently brisk, a regular "peach train" is run; that on the Delaware road, for instance, stopping at 15 principal peach stations. The baskets, duly addressed, are shelved in the cars, four deep, and away they thunder to Jersey City. On arrival, they are promptly put aboard barges, heavy, full-built, hopless affairs, and soon a fussy, puffing little steam-tug escorts the big barge across the river, fretting and fuming, like an irritable little man. When they reach the dock of Pier No. 1, or at West Washington Market, trucks convey the luscious fruit to the stalls of the commission dealers.

Peaches ripen promptly, and decay even more so. From picking to selling there must not be more than four days, or in extreme cases one or two more, even if the picking be done in Maryland and the selling in cold New Brunswick. Accordingly, the commission dealer is a prompt and busy man, and whether his day's receipts be 100 baskets or 10,000, next morning finds but very few of them left on his hands. They have gone aboard another train or to a Sound steamboat, and away they are careering to tickle the palates of epicureans generally. Those that remained have gone to the retailers, to the hotels, to the restaurants, or to the private consumer.

ASSORTING AND ARRANGING THE PEACHES FOR MARKET.

TROUT FISHING IN PENNSYLVANIA.

IF Izaak Walton were alive and a resident of this country, it is quite probable that about this season he would be found following up the mountain streams of Pennsylvania. It is here the bright-scaled carmine-speckled active speckled trout—the greatest favorite of anglers—can be found in abundance. Like the gipsy, the trout loves some special hiding-place, some sheltering stone or hole in the bank, whence it may watch for prey. Its peculiarly delicate flesh, its voracity, and the mixture of strength, agility and spirited courage, form a combination of excellences fascinating to both professional and amateur anglers. We give a sketch this week illustrative of one of those cool and delightful resorts in the interior of Pennsylvania, which debarmen desire most to visit.

OUR BRAVE DEPARTED.

BY J. B. SWETT.

WHERE the clouds of conflict lower,
On the distant field of battle,
'Mid the roar, and 'mid the rattle,
'Tis a fearful thing to die.

Yet, in such a trying hour,
Battling for the cause we cherish,
It is noblesse to perish,
And in death's cold arms to lie.

But the heart goes wild with yearning,
When the pall of death is falling;
And our natures, wildly calling,
Beg to die where loved ones weep.
And the spirit, homeward turning,
With these scenes to us the dearest,
And these hearts to us the nearest,
Is alone content to sleep.

It is sad for us to ponder
O'er the thousands who have perished
Thus, afar from things they cherished,
Just as dear as you or I.
And in sympathy we wander,
With our heart and soul of feeling,
Where the bolts of war were dealing
Death, where rang the battle cry.

Now the bells for joy are ringing,
And the shouts of victory swelling;
Victory's song, in toe; the knelling
Sound of death and tragic doom;
For to mind, those sounds are bringing
Scenes of death before our fancies;
And our spirit-visions glances
Into many a lowly tomb.

They have gone from us forever;
But a grateful memory, dwelling
In the nation's breast, is telling
How it loves its valiant braves.
Low they sleep—forgotten never—
In remembrance we adore them;
Gentle spirits hover o'er them,
In their lone neglected graves.

OUR STORY.

EIGHT years ago I was foreman in the Guilford powder works. It was a dangerous situation and not altogether as pleasant as it might have been. But the salary was larger than I could obtain in any other place just then; and this, to a man with an invalid mother and a little sister to support, was no mean object. Besides, I hoped at no very distant day to have a home of my own, presided over by the girl of my choice—beautiful Marion Ware. This dream of happiness in the future made me better contented with my lot. I was willing to work for a competence that she would share with me.

Marion and I had been playmates together. I could hardly recollect the time when I had not loved her; and when I went away to college (my family circumstances were better then at the period at which I am writing) we were engaged. I returned to find her the belle of Newark, but she was still true to me, and though it gave me a pang to see her careless flirting with other young men, I excused it and thought it would be all right when she was my wife. She was young and gay, and Newark was a dull place, I said; it would be downright selfishness in me to grudge her the little amusement she obtained from the country beau; so long as she loved only me, what need I care who she smiled upon? We were to be married in November, and as the time drew near an intense desire seized me to escape from the monotonous, dangerous existence I led in the mills. When I was married I should leave them forever; but somehow I could not wait for that time to arrive, I wanted a little freedom to myself. A few weeks would make no difference to my employers I thought, and so, when I gave my notice to leave, I gave it for the 14th of September, instead of November as I had first intended.

My employers were very sorry to part with me, and they offered to raise my salary from $800 to $1,000 if I would remain; but I had decided and was not to be turned from my decision. The last day of my stay passed quietly enough, and at night I left the dark buildings behind me with a thrill of relief.

I had not been so light-hearted since I was a boy. My bondage was over; henceforth I could breathe without fear that the next moment I should be blown above the clouds. I cast off the mill suit of clothing with a sensation akin to that which a prisoner must experience when he breaks the shackles of slavery. Once more I was a free man.

That was a happy evening. Marion had been spending the afternoon with my mother, and I had walked home with her. The moon was at its full, the west still flashing with the kiss of sunset, a few light decoy clouds sailed through the deep blue above—and we were lovers! We lingered along the way. I was in a hurry to break the spell of that sweet evening, and it was near midnight when I got home. Soon after I fell asleep, but my rest was troubled. I supposed I must have been dreaming, but it seemed a vivid reality to me then.

I was standing in the thick forest which surrounded the works, at the very point where the path to the village diverged, and led it over the hill and through the field to the mills. It was a wild, dreary path, for it was necessary that the mills should be removed as far from any human habitation as possible, and there was no more fitting spot than the "valley of despair," for miles around. A sullen stream flowing through it, supplied the water-power which moved the machinery, and in the dense forests were numberless blocks and heaps being converted into charcoal. I saw all this plainly in my dream. Even the great grey rock lay there as usual, at the place where I had often stopped to drink from the worn ont dippers, was right before me. There was a struggle in my mind; I thought I could not decide which path to take, the one leading into the distant village, or the old accustomed one to the mills. While I was sitting I heard a voice, clear, solemn and strong, that seemed to come from the ends of the earth, and it said:

"Go to the mills! Your work is not yet finished."

I awoke; the moon was shining coldly in at the window, the great arms of the elms moved slowly to and fro in the night wind, and a lonely cricket chirped in the wainscot. I lay down again thinking of little but my dream, as I was sure it had some only a dream, and shortly after fell asleep.

Again was that voice repeated with singular minuteness, circumstance of description, and again I awoke. I thought it returned to me, and I said that I should dream twice on the same matter, but explained it to myself that I had been thinking so much of my departure from the mills that was a coincidence, nothing more, I said, and turning over I soon lost my consciousness.

For the third time that haunted dream visited me, and this repetition was almost frightfully vivid. Everything about it bore an strongly the semblance of reality that I started up, covered with cold perspiration from head to foot, and in the room was illumined, as it were, the hollow echoes of that phantom voice.

The moon had gone down, the dawn was breaking in the east, and cold grey. I am not superstitious, and I will confess that an involuntary shudder went over me when I recollected what I had dreamed. I could not shake off the spell that was on my spirit, but in vain; it was as if I had walked world-lost to all humanity for ever. The dream and thought of every earthly thing was swallowed up in the recollection of that fearful voice.

I rose, and dressing myself, went down to work in the garden. This had always been a favorite employment of mine, but on this occasion it failed to restore my mind to its wonted tone. I was restless and uneasy, laboring under a consciousness of some duty unfulfilled.

At last I put down my hoe and went into the house. I put on my mill clothes, and caught the sitting-room, where my mother was. She looked up in surprise as I said:

"Mother, I am going to the mills."

"Indeed! I had hoped you were done going there, Edward. Yesterday was the fourteenth, was it not?"

"Yes; but I feel obliged to go to-day. My work is not yet done; it will be finished soon I think."

I kissed her and went out. The gloomy path through the woods looked gloomier than ever to me then ever. I hastened on, and soon came to the point where the paths diverged. Something urged me forward, and to my imagination the prophetic voice seemed to be throbbing in the air, urging me forward to the mills. At the door of the grinding-mill I met Mr. Morton, the senior proprietor. He grasped my hand eagerly.

"Ah, Gaylord, glad to see you! What's this I hear about your leaving us? Lincoln was speaking about it last night. Why we couldn't part with you at all."

"I did give notice to leave last night, and intended yesterday for my last day in the mill; but circumstances have decided me to remain somewhat less longer—a month, perhaps."

"Right; only you must not do time. We'll make your salary satisfactory, if that has anything to do with it—say twelve hundred a year—if you will stay. We are willing to pay you something for the risk you run."

"Thank you, I will think of it," I said, and went on with my work as usual.

Everything went quietly on in its accustomed routine. The great machine toiled on as ceaselessly; the men in their felt slippers went about as noiselessly as ever. I began to smile at the absurdity of my last night's vision; I had allowed too much supper, stayed out too long whispering soft nothings to Marion," I said to myself.

"Well, another month to be the world pass away in time," I said. "I could endure it as I had the many which had preceded it. It was not eternity!"

Towards night a party of visitors arrived. Such things were common. Now it was a company of summer rovers for the city people, and a solemn there was not complete without a visit to the powder mills. They had been considerably afraid of putting a stop to the admittance of visitors to the mills, on account of the danger they incurred and the trouble they gave us to put them in suitable trim to enter the operating-rooms, but it had not yet been decided upon, and we still suffered from the infliction.

I went out to meet this party, and to assist them in changing their shoes and garments—as might have buttons of any metallic substance; for it was one of the cardinal regulations, that no person should be allowed in the interior mills, who had a particle of metal about them, or nails in their shoes, for the fear of combustion by friction.

Our visitors were two gentlemen and three ladies. The two elder ladies I did not notice particularly, but the younger one attracted me, in spite of myself. Why, I didn't know. She was not really beautiful—my Marion was much more brilliant—but there was something about her better than beauty.

Her complexion was clear, with a tinge of rose color in her cheeks and lips. Her eyes were very dark, expressive hazel, her features pleasant, though not strictly regular, and her hair, bronze in the shade, golden in the sun, was put back in a mass of glittering wealth, to fall from her head in heavy curls. She was dressed in blue, some soft buttress material that fell around her with a matchless, indescribable charm.

She did not wish to enter the mill, but the others talked her a little onward and backward here, as she was not afraid, I knew, but she disliked to give us trouble, therefore we were all the readier to put themselves to inconvenience for her account. I have always noticed that those women who exact the least receive the most.

The gay company laughing, and joking, and bantering each other in regard to their fear, followed me in. The light in the blue walked quietly at my side, saying very little, but replying to the lively sallies of her companions—perhaps she thought it dictated mirth. I don't know.

We had been all the rounds, and had returned to the reception-room, next to the drying-room, at one end of the main building. This apartment overhung the pond, from whence came our supply of water, the basin of which was formed of a large dam across the head of the wooded hills. There was a large swinging door opening from the room directly over the pond, for the convenience of casting out refuse, and this door I threw open for the visitors to obtain a view of the prospect beyond. They stood on the brink, all but the lady in blue, who still stood looking out over the dreary scene, lighted by the departing rays of the harvest moon.

Suddenly I heard a low ominous hiss from the adjoining apartment, a sound which once heard is always remembered; my blood turned to ice in my veins.

I recognized my fate—in another second's time we should be in eternity.

I snatched the women by my side and plunged through the gaping doorway. Simultaneously a deafening rattar burst upon our ears, and a ball of fire globe was sent—ten thousand cannons were discharged into the powder. Sheet upon sheet rose eyes and nose—the air was black with missiles, which reached the water only a little later than we did. Down we fell, down with the speed of an interminable depth, but that plunge saved us.

When we came up everything was still. A deadly volume of smoke rolled over us, and once reeked with a suffocating smoke, rolling up from the ruins, dumb as the vapor of death.

I swam to the side with my companion, and supported her up the bank. She was not unconscious. Her dress was drenched with blood. I swam to the side to seek the source, and found the crimson tide flowed not from her veins, but from a deep gash in my own left arm, where once belonged my own right hand! It had been blown off.

Later I experienced a strange singing in the head of my friends, and then unconsciousness, as I was fearfully gashed. The very bones grated beneath the pressure of my fingers.

I went home like one in a waking dream. I remember very little of it, except that the lady in blue was with me, that she talked soothingly to me in a cool voice, and that my mother, with a self-sacrificing agonize from some sharp instrument, she endured them all with a smile of gentle rest and peace, after that all was blank.

There was a little snow on the hills that I could see from the window. When I awoke to consciousness, I spoke my first thought. Where is Marion? Mother tried to put me off with an evasive answer, but I would not be denied. She told me all. I was not to see her since the day of the accident, and then all was over. I had suffered a shriek of horror, and fled from the room.

"But has she sent no message?"

"There is a note, but you must not read it till you are better. You have been ill two weeks delirious, and the excitement may be fatal."

"Give me the letter," I said, with all my stern strength in my voice, "if not, I will get up and seek it myself."

She brought it to me, the delicate, rose-perfumed thing, no more beautiful than she who dictated it. It was elegantly got up altogether.

Miss Ware sympathized with me deeply—hoped and trusted I would soon be well to health, &c., &c., and ended in releasing me from my engagement. She prayed I might be granted resignation, and closed in a most cold, formal manner. Sisters and attended friend.

I crushed this scroll in my hand. I would have ground it to powder—annihilated its very dust from the face of the earth, if I could. I didn't want to enter Marion Ware's life. I am not sure but I did. It would not be strange.

Every day there was a fresh bouquet of hothouse flowers sent to my room, and a gentleman who after a while I began to feel curious about them. I asked my mother where they came from.

"Miss Gaylord sent them."

"Miss Gaylord? I know no such person."

"The young lady you saved from the explosion with you. She is a Miss Adele Gaylord, of Trenton, and to her you owe an everlasting debt of gratitude, Edward. I often think she saved your life, for when you raved in delirium, and would have torn off the bandages from your head, when the surgeon had prepared your wound, she almost had the power to quiet you. Why, when you was at the worst, she stood over you three days and nights without sleeping, never complaining, never getting out of patience with your moods. She is an angel."

I thought so myself. I knew then the meaning of the fair visions that had haunted my delirious brain during those days of anxious suffering. I knew whose soft voice had come to me sometimes like harp notes, whose gentle hand soothed away the pain from my brow, and pressed down my eyelids with sweetest sleep.

"Where is she now?" I asked.

"At the La Tourette House. She was spending the summer with some distant connection of the family at the time of the accident. They all perished in that dreadful explosion, and she has been awaiting the return of Col. Gaylord, her father, who has been away sometime in China. He is daily expected now, and will take his daughter to their home in Trenton. He is a man of influence and wealth, and she is his only child."

Miss Gaylord called on several times during the next three weeks. How beautiful she was to me now.

On the first of December I was able to sit up most of the time and go out some.

One clear starlight night my mother left me at the foot of the first stair during my illness also and my little sister Effie went to a Sabbath school concert in the village. I brightened the fire on the hearth, drew up a great arm-chair, and set down to a quiet hour of dreaming. The music of bright clouds around me. The music ceased for a moment, then passed down the road, the door opened softly, and Adele Gaylord came in. Lissing air and fleecing snow, at seeing me stops, wrapped up in rich furs and crimson hood, she paused on the threshold. I rose up to meet her.

"Come in, Miss Gaylord, I am glad to welcome you."

"Where is your mother?"

"Gone to the village with Effie. Let me take off your wraps, will you?"

She laughed, threw back her hood and took off her outside garments. She was hardly at her ease.

"Indeed, I ought not to stay, Mr. Greene, papa was going to the Ridge, and will be back at eight, and will take me home then."

"You are not afraid of me, Miss Gaylord. I am not a lion, and have not one hand. I think you will stay. I should have been very lonesome."

She looked doubtful, and sat down with me before the fire. I talked incessantly, just as people will whose hearts are too full to trust themselves to be still. I thought she seemed a little sad, but, perhaps, it was mere fancy. The clock struck eight, and simultaneously the sound of sleigh bells reached the frosty air. Adele arose and put on her shawl.

"I called to say good-bye, Mr. Greene," said she, in a low voice, "as I am going away to-morrow. I am very sorry not to have seen Mrs. Morton; you will give my adieu to her and to Effie."

"Yes; you go to Trenton, do you not?"

"Yes, I long for my home."

"And when do you return?"

She drew my view beneath the folds of crimson worsted.

The next moment I held her in my arms.

"Adele, you can't leave me! Remember, I am but the mutilated wreck of a man, but my heart is strong, and true, and tender."

"Hush, hush, Edward!" she said, "and I should be unworthy of a love like yours did I care the less for you because of this sad misfortune. I love you. I wish it had never happened to you. For my own I have not a single regret."

The sleigh whose bells we had heard had long ago passed by; it was not her father; and we sat down before the fire, and the most nearly perfect happiness I had ever known.

Colonel Gaylord came at last to find his daughter engaged to me. Time has made sweet and pretty consumption making the condition of things pretty evident to a man of sense. We went up to him together. Adele knelt at his feet softly to him:

"Father, this is Mr. Greene, who saved me when the powder mill blew up. I love him and he loves me. Will you give us your blessing?"

"I am happy to meet you, Mr. Greene," he said, giving her soft hand to me, and very kindly to you, but really I had no idea to give her up to you in this unceremonious fashion. However, if you have won her and she you, and you are of the honest man that people say you are, take her and may God deal with you as you deal with her."

I was glad that Colonel Gaylord was at his ease, and a few weeks later Adele Gaylord became my wife. She was young, and so a gentleman who had long sought her favor; a gay, wealthy young fellow, and fortune and superior goodness of heart. So much the better for him, I said, when I heard of it.

The Gaylord powder works were never rebuilt, but I purchased their site, and their ruins I have erected a beautiful house to mark the spot on, as I first met her who has made my life beautiful.

A Temple Discovered at Pompeii.—Letters from Naples describe a temple of Juno, just discovered among the recent excavations at Pompeii. Three hundred skeletons were found crowded within the sanctuary, a propitiatory service having evidently been held in the hour they were overwhelmed. The statue of the goddess still with abundant peacock, the tripod in front of the altar, the golden censer, the vases for the holy water, the paintings on the vessels holding the drapery of sacred blood, are in the recitation swarm. The eyes of Juno were of the most vivid enamel, her arms and her whole person richly decorated with gold trinkets, her gaudy bird reproduced with a clasher of glistening scarce. Aromatic ingredients lay calcined within the censer, while gorgeous tissues and bronze ornaments strewed the mosaiked pavements.

PASSING AWAY!

BY LEWIS C. JOHNSTON.

Is childhood's bright hour, I've sat by the stream,
And watched the glad waters in play,
And seen the green leaves chase each other in sport,
But, alas! they were passing away;
And heeds the old oak, with her ivy side,
Where we gazed at the tree turning grey,
But stream, oak, and sweetheart, not one of them left—
Alas! they have all passed away.
Passing away! passing away!

I remember we've sat on long winter nights,
By the hearth, but my thoughts far would stray,
As I looked on my parents, their eyes growing dim,
And I thought—they are passing away!
My old grey-haired father, bent double with care—
My mother, whose kneeling to pray—
My light-hearted sister, my kind-hearted brother—
Alas! they have all passed away.
Passing away! passing away!

I'm old now and feeble, 'tis useless to sigh,
For the friends of a bright summer day,
My turn will come next, I can feel death's approach,
And I soon will be passing away.
My friends all have gone to that bright land above,
There for ever and ever to stay;
And I know His great name, that permits me to go
Where nothing is passing away!
Passing away! passing away!

MAUDE,

Aged 20.

BY MARION WALLACE.

A SUMILIAR French author has remarked that every one contains within himself the ashes of a poet, dead in early youth. Most of us, on the least sentimental—even we who pride ourselves on our utter freedom from romantic notions, have in our hearts, away down deep, a hidden chamber, a Bluie Eden, haunted by the remembrance of our earliest, purest first love—for it is but the heart's first offering the holiest, most sacred, of all its after emotions?—into whose secluded recesses we may retire at will.

Often, in my heart of hearts, have I thought that, and thought of the influence which Maude exercised so inseparably with the acute joy, in living over the past, that we can scarcely diminish them. I have found it so, and I also believe that, for the sake of the pleasurable emotion being re-experienced, one will almost willingly suffer the attendant pain.

The short recital of my life might not be uninteresting, were it not the ever constant yearning for that which never can return, I feel that upon it, not tediously long, but brief as consistent.

Maude Aubrey was mine—all my own. For months and years I had known her but to love her, when the moment my eyes rested upon her, a bright, gay girl of sixteen, a strange desire to possess her for my own, to love her, and care for her, took hold upon me, and it never left me till I accomplished it.

She was young, wild and untamed, as far as the rigid rules of etiquette may be considered to subdue one; her robust, healthy face, sparkling eyes and radiant, off-hand demeanor, was just the style to interest me, and others too, it seemed, judging from the covert glances when she walked to church or by the side with her handsome, though sheerwit father, and haughty proud mien.

To love, as I did this creature, so young and yet so undeveloped, yet, you know, of the first confusion of the purest diamond—my young, ardent, wild, it might have been to all but myself. I asked no questions of my heart, and went on, happy in knowing Maude Aubrey liked me very much, and her parents treating me as they did.

My cousin's property adjoined theirs, and, in consequence of our great neighborliness, a passage-way had been formed out under the ground, communicating by a subterranean walk from the dining-room at one termination, and my smoking-room at the other, thus uniting the families, as it were, in one.

At the time of my little episode I am trying to forget passage, and I could hear her merry happy voice before the room-door opened, and her sunny sweet escape for me, and beguiled many an otherwise tedious hour, and then she would close the door, or push her visitor from me, and laying her curly brown head on my knee, say:

"Now, brother, I've accommodated you; you must amuse me now. Where's Hermann?"

And so the beautiful summer passed, music, boating, reading, picnicing and riding; and the autumn came on, with the social gatherings, sleighing parties, holiday festivities, and long social evenings.

On Christmas day Maude completed her seventeenth year, still that rare thing, a child; I very rare, for few reach that age unconsidered by the secular passions and influences, waiting, with all the eagerness of a proselyte to snatch the young, confiding stranger into its startagies, and drag her into its vortex of fashionable allurements and dissipations.

How anxious I was for Maude! I feared her proud mother would desire her beautiful daughter "to be introduced" at this early age, while I knew her father would not for a moment countenance it, if he saw Mrs. Aubrey's intentions.

"Mr. Aubrey," I said one day, "your daughter is just convenient at the holidays, is she to be introduced?"

"Why, man, you're crazy! Little Maude, not yet finished her studies at home, despite the terra at Madame L'Oivean's to polish her up and put on the extras—she ready to go into the world? No, sir."

"My dear, dear friend, you so relieve me. I was apprehensive. Dear little Maude! She seems so innocent and free from guile. Sir, she is a jewel, and you are justly proud of her; I, too, feel unusually interested in her, in fact, were she older, I should tell her."

"Tell her what?" He spoke eagerly. "Not that you love her?"

Without looking at him, I replied, steadily:

"Yes, Mr. Aubrey, I truly love your daughter. Young though she is, for a year I have never ceased regarding her with the same tender emotion; and, with your consent, I shall one day ask her to be my wife."

"My boy, my dear son, give me your hand! From my soul I thank you and bless you. My wife and I often have expressed the wish that our child and you might one day marry. You are young—just twenty-five, are you not?—rich and good-tempered; what more could a parent ask for his child? When you both see fit, marry and be happy."

My joy can better be imagined than portrayed; this is one of the heart agonies I suffer in recalling the past, and one I still would not for countless gold forget. What a strange anomaly is human nature.

In all her freshness and purity I wanted to tell my first love story, and my last and only one, to my darling; how I longed to teach her what love was, yet I hastened not about my task, the anticipation was so tempting that I enjoyed much in dwelling upon it, leaving the realization to a future hour. One pleasant morning Maude came as customary to my room, her embroidery in one hand and a new poem in the other.

"Here, cher frere, read me Enoch Arden, while I finish mamma's stool; you know I am going to Madame L'Oivean's soon."

"You are? Why you greatly surprise me—when?"

"In March, we think; then I'll get home in time for my birthday ball."

Her eyes danced with pleasure.

"Come, read, won't you?"

I opened the new volume and cut the fresh leaves with a mechanical far-away air. Going, and had I better tell her or leave her untrammeled to choose her own lover? The latter I could not do, I was fearful of losing her. Enoch Arden I read to her, and as I reached the scene of the story, I saw Maude's lashes glittering and trembling. Through that affecting portion where her first husband—her true love—comes back and finds her the wife of another, I slowly went, and at last closed the book with a sigh.

"Wasn't it sad, just think of it!"

Her sympathizing tears fell for poor Arden.

"Maude, what would you have thought were you Annie?"

She raised her head and answered vehemently:

"I don't pity her any—I never would have but one husband."

"Then you never could love but one?"

"Why, yes, I do now—papa and mamma and you."

"How do you know you love me, sis?"

"You're my brother, aren't you? and that's the reason I love you."

"No, Maude, it is because I love you."

My breath came quick and short.

"I knew it, dear brother, and that is why you can write such beautiful verses, and can paint my pictures so perfectly, because you love me and think of me."

"Yes, dear."

"Then, I am sure I love you more than I do papa and mamma, because when I am alone, I always see your face, and I had rather be here than home, and—and—"

She hesitated, faltered, glanced at me, then blushed deliciously. My heart had not misconstrued hers; unconsciously she had loved me, and now her heart suddenly felt all a woman's love and tenderness; the first hand to unstop the fountain was mine, she loved me, Maude Aubrey was mine. Joy sometimes kills; to me it only opened into more life a new existence.

Could I only cease this wild yearning for her now; it seems I must see again my little child-betrothed, but no, I know she never will come to me, though I may meet her. I wait and wait, and wish the hour might come.

From Madame L'Oiveau's she came, pure, unsullied and fresh as when my farewell kiss was upon her lips. Happy, lightsome as air, she danced through the old familiar rooms at home; her glad songs burst from her lips just as of yore, and sitting in my room, I could hear the patter of her feet coming to my side.

Towards me she was the same, only there was a shade of reserve and maidenly modesty, rendering her tenfold more attractive; she met the warm glance of my eye, and her own, though equally lighted, would instantly be cast down, and the delicate skin become suffused with "woman's charm"—the blush. Christmas and its snows came; in floating garments Maude was arrayed, with white flowers on her bosom and in her hair.

Shall I ever forget the only times I saw her in white? Once was on her birthnight's ball, when full of beauty, youth, hope and excitement, she was about to taste the first intoxicating draught of earth's gaieties, and be ushered in as a new actor on the stage of life. Drama or tragedy? Alas, alas! it was ——! Again in white robes, pale flowers lying on her bosom; brown hair in thin curls clustering to a wan brow; white hands crossed meekly on the still breast—snowy cheeks swept by long lashes closing over sightless eyes; the narrow couch; the odor of geranium; the silver screws and plated lid—

"MAUDE.
Aged 20."

The tragedy over; the curtain fallen, dividing Time from Eternity. We laid her away under the daisies, burying our broken hearts with her.

The debut was over; Miss Aubrey's praises rang loud and long; courted, flattered, lionized, I feared her young head would be turned by adulation and homage; but it didn't seem so—for at home she was just the same as erst. The morning kiss and good-night embrace, and when she was at leisure from her many engagements, she would come and bring her low stool and embroidery, and sit by my side, while, from her beautiful face I drank in new draughts of love and inspiration.

"My darling," I said one day, "I almost wonder you love me now, you have seen so many others; then, you could compare me with no one, but now—"

"Now I love you better than ever. What, love you less because you are such a splendid artist?"

How laughing her eyes were; she knew what I meant.

"Pet, you know my misfortune debars me from much of the society in which I would mingle were it otherwise; as it is, I prefer remaining here alone, with my books and brushes, trusting my Maude among many would-be-rivals."

She caressed my hand tenderly.

"Never doubt me, darling; this dear foot, almost useless as it is, I love better than life; and I never can forget one who won my young girlish heart."

Could I doubt such loving assurances? I did not.

The summer came, and with its sultry days, my beautiful birdling and her parents left home for a cool sojourn on the sea-shore. Mr. Aubrey urgently entreated my accompanying them, but I declined for two reasons; one, I preferred the comforts and convenience of a large airy room, to a close, disagreeable hotel apartment; the other, should I go, I feared rumor might imagine Miss Aubrey and I engaged, as I would attend her, and as no soul save her parents knew of our betrothal, I preferred it should be secret, and let Maude enjoy her first season untrammeled and free as most young ladies do.

Letters from the shore came semi-weekly; Mr. Aubrey kind, good-natured as usual; madame exact, dignified, yet charming; Maude loving, loyal, devoted.

Among a large packet of letters—they are old, faded and torn now, soiled with tears—are three or four I received while she was there. Let me read them—they are short:

"The fun and excitement here, dearest, is just what suits me; somewhat livelier than city life, because so many different styles of people are thrown in contact. Among the boarders is a Miss Iberville; she is splendid; of course we are great friends as our rooms join; her wardrobe is parfait; beside that attraction is another—her brother; (I hope he'll forgive my mentioning him in such close connection with his sister's handsome clothes); but really he is splendid; such a sweet name, too, 'Percy Iberville,' isn't it? But don't be 'green,' dear one, for I am not dans amour yet. Can't you really come on, and spend the remaining three weeks? Do, please do, won't you?"

Another, a week later, says:

"Iberville and I have just returned from a delightful drive on the beach; he is, without exception, the handsomest man I ever saw. He can quote from many poets, and his intonation is exquisite; Tennyson is his favorite, as it is mine—quite a coincidence, isn't it? So you can't really come? Too bad; but I will be home soon now, unless indeed, I conclude to stay longer than papa and mamma."

Do you see, as I too quickly saw, the difference in the letter? Ah, the cloud was rising, no "bigger than a man's hand," yet, with love's prescience, I knew it and felt it. Without waiting for more ground, I wrote a pleading, passionate letter, begging her to remember me, her vows, herself, and not to be led away in a moment of rashness; she would wreck one true heart, and afterwards herself repent.

Then I implored, cautioned her. Anxiously I awaited a reply. Confidently I expected a long, loving epistle, chiding my want of confidence, and bidding me patiently await her return.

It came, the last; here it is. Never since the hour I read it first, as it scorched itself into my brain in living characters of flame, have I opened it; it is fresh and unsoiled, but I will repeat it—I know it; that one reading was enough:

"Your needless consideration has led me to believe you might possibly prove still more tyrannical in married life; besides, I am Iberville's betrothed wife, and expect to be married in the winter. I did not hesitate about accepting him, as I did not consider what you choose to call 'an engagement' at all binding, as it was made so early in life. Hoping you will congratulate us, I remain, respectfully, M. A."

Goaded by a wild frenzy, I dashed off a reply, fierce, wild, bitter. Would to God my right hand had withered before I had penned a syllable of it! But it was so to be.

I believe in Fate, do not you? Else why the crushed hearts, doomed happiness and broken lives of the many, who might have escaped had they acted or done differently? Yes, Fate and Destiny ever walk hand in hand.

When the Aubreys returned to their home, I was gone. Old associations thronged too strongly upon me and I fled, taking my effects with me.

Where had I gone? I knew or cared not where, anywhere—anywhere from the presence of familiar objects that all spoke with ceaseless tongue of my once loving but lost love.

With almost crazed brain I sped on, and on, till this quiet mountain hamlet attracted me and I stopped here.

Six months after my flight I received a letter dated from Mr. Aubury's post-office.

"Come quickly, if you would see her alive; she calls continually for you."

The thought of seeing her again—even the wife of another—dispelled all save an insane desire to behold her; not tarrying to wonder how Mr. Aubrey knew my address, or wondering why, if married, Maude was home, or why her husband did not communicate with me, I hastened off and found her—dying.

My God! and was this my Maude? rosy, laughing, gay, when I saw her last! pale, emaciated, almost transparent, in her extreme attenuation.

I entered the chamber; her eye was bright, and she beckoned me to come.

"Darling, I forgive you that cruel letter. I always loved you, but you gave me up. Iberville—and—I—were—were——"

Her exertion had exhausted her, and the scarlet life-blood oozed from her lips.

In agony I had listened; in awful suspense I awaited the test.

"Lonely"—she whispered it.

"We were only good friends—Percy and I—and I never thought of him loving me till he proposed, and—and—I'm faint, hold my head up—up on your bosom where I used to lay it—so—I rejected him, darling, because I never loved but you. You gave me up without any reason, but I sent for you because I did so want to die in your arms. Do you love me now with a little of the old love? Please do, darling, for I'm going so soon. Just a little love to die with; one kiss, like you used to—your Maude—true to—the—last—love."

Reader, my heart almost breaks while I transcribe the dying moments of my lost darling.

She never spoke again; but with her head resting on my heart, her arms around my neck, she died; her breath she used to the last minute to assure me of her deep affection.

What could it mean? Love me after releasing me from all claims upon her? What did she mean?

Even with her head in my embrace, the spirit just fled and mourning friends gathered around, came the explanation, the exposure of a crime that as surely deserved gibbeting as murder, cold-blooded slaughter, for it killed my darling. A letter, short, sarcastic, fiendish, directed to the angel form in my arms.

I opened it, and read what made my very hair turn white and what almost stupified me.

It was a disclosure of the deceit practiced upon upon me; a letter from Iberville's sister—the letter, you know, forged by her and purporting to be from my Maude. And there she lay, its murdered victim, reading a letter. It was superscribed to an angel! I never could tell her now about my letter, so bitter and fierce, which the fiend took care should reach her, and she had died, gone for ever from me in the full belief of my falsity; she had begged for one little spark of love, when my heart was burning with it.

My brain whirled. I was mad—mad!

Years have passed, and my hair is whiter than ever, and my step more faltering; yet every day I totter to a shady nook in the graveyard and pray over a green hillock, marked at its head on a simple marble:

"MAUDE,
Aged 20."

HOW TO DRESS FOR A PHOTOGRAPH.—A lady or gentleman having made up her or his mind to be photographed, naturally considers, in the first place, how to be dressed, so as to show off to the best advantage. This is by no means such an important matter as many might imagine. Let me offer a few words of advice touching dress. Orange color, for certain optical reasons, is photographically black. Blue is white; other shades or tones of color are proportionately darker or lighter as they contain more or less of these colors. The progressive scale of photographic color commences with the lightest. The order stands thus: white, light blue, violet, pink, mauve, dark blue, lemon, blue-green, leather-brown, drab, cerise, magenta, yellow-green, dark brown, purple, red, amber, marone, orange, dead black. Complexion has to be much considered in connection with dress. Blondes can wear much lighter colors than brunettes; the latter always presents better pictures in dark dresses, but neither look well in positive white. Violent contrasts of color should be especially guarded against. In photography, brunettes possess a great advantage over their fairer sisters. The lovely golden tresses lose all their transparent brilliancy, and are represented black; whilst the "bonnie blue e'e," theme of rapture to the poet, is misery to the photographer; for it is put entirely out. The simplest and most effective way of removing the yellow color from the hair, is to powder it nearly white: it is thus brought to about the same photographic tint as in nature. The same rule, of course, applies to complexions. A freckle quite invisible at a short distance, is, on account of its yellow color, rendered most painfully distinct when photographed. The puff-box must be called into the assistance of art. Here let me intrude one word of general advice. Blue, as we have seen, is the most readily affected by light, and yellow the least; if, therefore, you will keep your complexions clear and free from tan and freckles whilst taking your delightful rambles at the sea-side, discard by all means the blue veil, and substitute a dark-green or yellow one in its stead. Blue tulle offers no more obstruction to the acting rays of the sun than white. Half a yard of yellow net, though perhaps not very becoming, will be found more efficacious and considerably cheaper than a quart of kalydor. The cause of freckles is simple enough. It is nothing more than a darkening of the salts of iron contained in the blood, by the action of light. A freckled face is, therefore, an animated photograph.

THE SHAH'S JEWELS.—The gem of the whole collection was the far-famed Deriah Noor, or Sea of Light, taken by Nadir Shah from Mohammed, the Mogul Emperor of India. This superb diamond was set in plain gold as the buckle of a sword belt. In form it is oblong, about two inches in length, one and a-half in breadth, and in thickness not three-quarters of an inch. It is perfectly plain, not being cut in angles, as is usual with diamonds. The front is quite smooth, and it seemed exactly like a bit of very thick plate glass. This celebrated diamond is considered equal in fineness and water to the renowned Koh-i-Noor, or Mountain of Light, in the possession of Queen Victoria, which, taken from India at the same time, after various adventures found its way to the Treasury of Runjeet Singh, the Sikh chief, and thence into English hands. A great number of uncut emeralds and some very large turquoises were shown to us, and also a quantity of embroidery ornamented with pearls, some of which were very large. Most of the emeralds were full of flaws, but they were of enormous size, some crystals being nearly three inches in length, and of corresponding breadth. A very handsome kaleoun of state of green enamel, ornamented with emeralds, was no less remarkable for the simplicity and elegance of its shape than from the rich materials of which it was composed. All these treasures were handed to us without hesitation, and passed from hand to hand round the circle. We were surprised indeed at the little care seemingly taken of jewels representing such enormous wealth, the loss of one of which would infallibly have entailed that of the guardian's head.

THE CHAMOIS.

THERE is perhaps no animal so peaceful, and, at the same time, so timid, as the chamois. Nature, therefore, besides endowing it with a facility of climbing into the most inaccessible places, and thus avoiding pursuit, has enabled it to guard against the approach of danger by the great acuteness of its senses of sight, smell, and hearing. It is this which makes it so very difficult to get near them. A rolling stone or spoken word at once attracts their attention; and they will look and listen to discover whence the sound has come that breaks the silence of their mountain solitude. For an incredibly long time they will then stand gazing fixedly in one direction, quite immovable; and if it happen to be towards something in your neighborhood that their attention has been attracted, you must lie still and close, indeed, to escape their observation. The eyes of the whole herd will be fixed on the spot in a long steady stare; and as you anxiously watch them from afar, they almost look like fragments of rock, so motionless are they while they gaze. You begin to hope they have found no cause for alarm, when "Phew!" the sharp whistle tells they have fathomed the mystery, and away they move to the precipitous rocks overhead; unless panic-stricken, they stop from time to time to look behind; and then suddenly uttering the peculiar shrill sound, again move on. A chamois, when dashing down the mountains, will suddenly stop as if struck by a thunderbolt, some yards from the spot where recent human footprints are to be found in the snow, and, turning scared away, rush off immediately in an opposite direction. The taint which the presence of the hunter has left behind, is perceived by it long after he has passed. The chief strength of the animal is in its hind legs, which, if extended, would be longer than the others. On this account it springs upwards with more ease than it descends the mountain, and on the level ground its walk is clumsy and ungraceful. It is not made to run, but bounds along over the ground. The hoof is cloven, long and pointed, and the slot of the chamois resembles that of a sheep. The edges are sharp, which causes it to slip easily on the ice, and on this account it rather avoids passing the glaciers. When standing, the hind legs are always bent, as if the animal were preparing to lie down, which, no doubt, helps considerably to break the fall when leaping from a great height. Notwithstanding this, the croup is still somewhat higher than the fore part of the body. The elastic force which the hind legs possess is immense. With a sudden bound the chamois will leap up against the face of a perpendicular rock, and merely touching it with his hoofs, rebound again in an opposite direction to some higher crag, and thus escape from a spot where, without wings, egress seems impossible. When reaching upwards on its hind legs, the fore hoofs resting on some higher spot, it is able to stretch to a considerable distance, and with a quick spring will bring up its hind quarters to a level with the rest of the body, and, with all four hoofs close together, stand poised on a point of rock not broader than your hand. On narrow overhanging ledges some thousand feet high they walk and gaze about, enjoying the security from pursuit which such spots afford.

LADIES RIDING SIDEWAYS ON HORSEBACK.—The introduction of this style of riding in England is attributed to Anna of Bohemia, consort of Richard II. She it was (according to Stowe) that originally showed the women of this country how gracefully and conveniently they might ride on horseback sideways. Another old historian, enumerating the new fashions of Richard II.'s reign, observes: "Likewise noble ladies then used high heads, and corsets, and robes with long trains, and seats on side-saddles on their horses, by the example of the respectable Queen Anna, daughter of the King of Bavaria, who first introduced the custom into the kingdom; for before, women of every rank rode as men." Stothard, in his beautiful illustrative picture of Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims, appears (according to the above-quoted authorities) to have committed an anachronism in placing the most conspicuous female character of his fine composition sideways on her steed. That the lady ought to have been depicted riding in the male fashion, might have been inferred without any historical research on the subject, from the poet's describing her as having on her feet "a pair of spurres sharpe."

AUTOMATONS.—Some wonderful accounts are handed down of mechanism so constructed as to resemble animals, and even human beings, in figure, and imitate their actions. Archytas, of Tarentum, about 400 years before the Christian era, is said to have made a wooden pigeon that could fly. Albertus Magnus constructed an automaton to open the door when any one knocked. The celebrated Regiomontanus made a wooden eagle that flew forth from the city, saluted the Emperor and returned. He also constructed an iron fly, which flew out of his hand and returned, after flying about the room. In 1738 an automaton flute-player was exhibited at Paris that could play on the flute in the same manner as a living performer. In 1741 Vaucanson produced a flageolet-player, which played the flageolet with the left hand and beat the tambourine with the right. He also made a duck, which dabbled in the water, swam, drank and quacked like a real duck. A Frenchman exhibited a duck a few years ago which went through some of the same movements. Automatons have been constructed which wrote, played on the pianoforte, counted, &c. During the present century a Swiss, named Maillardet, constructed a figure, representing a female, which performed eighteen tunes on the piano, and continued in motion an hour. He also made another figure, representing a boy, that could write and draw.

THE COWS AND MILKMAIDS OF HOLLAND.—The most really picturesque attraction of the scene is the herds of cattle. These are of a native breed peculiar to the country, and from the quantity and quality of their milk, as well as from the laudable propensity of the beef to accumulate on those parts that are worth a handsome price per pound, are greatly valued by the people. They are generally of a coal-black hue, but spotted and streaked with white in the most curious manner. The pride which the Hollanders take in their cattle is well deserved, and is very conspicuous in the care they take of them. The cows are kept in stables, often as neat as most of our own kitchens, and far neater than some of them. The majority of the poorer classes in our own country are not accommodated with such good quarters. When they are taken to pasture their feet are covered with leather shoes, lest the dampness of the soil should cause disease of that part; they are always carefully curried and brushed and washed, while in summer they are covered with cotton cloths, that they may not suffer from the attacks of those little winged Zouaves that despoil us so often of our night's rest. In winter they are protected from the cold by blankets. On their way to the fields they are attended by milkmaidens of the ruddiest complexions, who take good care that their tempers are not ruffled, and show the most affectionate regard for their welfare. The Hollanders have not suffered the race of milkmaids to die out as we have, and one can hardly avoid instituting a melancholy comparison between the present times and the old in this respect in our own country. How great the difference between those who, in the days of our ancestors, used to carry about the richest of milk in neat little tubs on their heads, and after their day's labors were over did nothing but dance with their sweethearts in concentric circles around flower-crowned maypoles, and that grouty fellow who slinks round to one's backdoor in the morning before light, as if he were ashamed of himself, and leaves a wine quart of water and chalk, after first carefully shaking it in order to mix it.

UNDER THE SNOW.

INTO my room, came a sweet little maiden,
Back from her brow fell the sunset-hued hair,
And I thought as I met the blue eyes of the darling,
I never had seen childish beauty so fair.

Her skin like the inside of sea-shell so dainty,
With a bright coral tint on her cheek all aglow,
As with voice like low music, she tearfully uttered,
"My birdie, my treasure lies under the snow.

"I fed him all summer, he came when I called him,
And sang to me songs at morning and eve,
And oh! dearest lady, if you had but seen him,
And loved him, and lost him, I'm sure you would grieve.

"But you look now so happy, and smile on me gently,
For nothing has happened to make your tears flow,
While I cannot play, as I think of my treasure,
My poor little birdie that is under the snow."

Ah! child, in thy sorrow thou know'st not my sadness,
The smile on my lips tells a falsehood to thee,
The brow so unruffled conceals the crushed spirit,
Which in thy sweet ignorance thou can'st not see.

But come to my side, and I'll tell thee a vision,
Which will ne'er leave my eyes wherever I go,
'Tis the last look of love, that I dreamed he threw on me,
Ere he died, and was buried—there—under the snow.

Thou has't heard of the troubles that came to our country,
When last year's spring blossoms were spread o'er the land,
And how our brave troops, rushed like heroes to battle,
When the trumpet of war gave out its command.

There was one, then, I loved with a wife's true affection,
And his voice when he spoke was to me soft and low;
But, alas! he now rests in the grave of the soldier,
In the far Western land, there, under the snow.

I know, dearest child, that he died fighting bravely,
And he sent me his love, ere his life passed away,
But the sunshine is darkened which shone o'er my spirit,
Since I heard the sad news of that fearful day.

He bade me not weep, for he died for his country,
And that thought alone checks the tears as they flow;
Though my heart yearns in agony over my treasure,
Who, far from his loved home, lies under the snow.

But one day, when the din of life's battle is over,
The weary march ended, the work here all done,
When the sorrows are gone which clouded my pathway,
The last fight finished, the victory won—

I hope they will take me where my treasure lies buried,
Though how much I loved him the world cannot know,
And there where the brave and the true-hearted lies sleeping,
I'll rest by his side deep under the snow.

CHAPTER IX.—HOW THE HEIRS-EXPECTANT MET.

IT was some time before there was any movement in the positions of the group. Absorbed in grief that he had not been able to exchange a single kind word or look with his uncle, and unconscious of the presence of spectators, Anthony gave way without restraint to his emotions. And still the housekeeper gazed in sympathetic silence. Still Sleuth looked on with a face set to an expression of mournful interest, which but little suggested the terrible chaos beneath.

Past and future were, for the moment, alike awful. He had done that which nothing could undo—even to his own conscience—but he had no time to think of what this word conscience might mean in the future years, should he succeed in baffling all suspicion of his guilt, for, as yet, he was surrounded by dangers, which made it extremely possible that everything would be at once discovered. The coat was lying in the stable-yard under a truss of hay, which had been thrown down over night from the loft above the stable, and left against the wall for use the first thing in the morning. But it is yet only day-break. He is probably safe till, at least, half-past five; the groom, though up like the rest of the household, on account of the event of the night, will hardly begin work before his usual hour, six. But by that time the dangerous garment must be got rid of somehow. Sleuth almost speculates on going now—even before speaking to Anthony—but while he glances at the thought, he sees its absurdity and danger, and resolves to wait for a safer opportunity.

And, then, as he still watches Anthony's sorrow and self-abandonment, he wonders if he has found the codicil during his hunt after the robbers, if he has got it in his pocket, and if his satisfaction on that point has anything to do with the suffering he now exhibits. Sleuth doesn't like this display. It seems to reproach him. He fancies his cousin wouldn't be so full of trouble for the dead alderman if he hadn't had some certain assurance given him that the old man had left him all.

But the future is scarcely less absorbing to Sleuth's busy thoughts. He may not find the codicil, either now or hereafter. That contingency must not be forgotten for a single instant, for then Anthony will be his only friend. Sleuth almost smiles as he reflects, how great a friendship there must be, if the codicil is not forthcoming.

But the codicil shall be found. If there be one thing in life of which Sleuth can feel sure, it is that he is not going to be juggled out of the fortune he has won by playing such desperate games, either by "Cousin Anthony's" cleverness in concealing the precious document (if he really has got it), or by his ingenuity (if he has not) in being the first to discover in the burglars the actual possessors, and in buying from them the all-important paper.

But then he (Sleuth) must for that reason also keep where he is, in the same house, so that he may ever be on the watch, and be prepared for either contingency; to discover the document, if hidden by Anthony, or to get hold of the burglars if they sent any messenger prowling about to open negotiations. Yes, it is clear; he must admire and love cousin Anthony very much; and be his one faithful, ever-watchful friend. Again Richard Sleuth's smooth face is lighted up by a lurid glow of mirthfulness, which hardly seems to belong to it, but to be the far-off reflection of some other face with a truly demoniacal smile turned upon the murderer, as much as to say, "Well done!"

But Richard Sleuth measures things by a new standard since the experience of the last half hour. He feels to have grown in intellectual stature a whole cubit—to have suddenly-developed powers and capacities of which, in his inexperience and conceit, he knew not previously. He is no longer the cunning fool that he, no doubt, often had been in his behavior to his uncle. He had from the first moment of patronage felt afraid of the old man. Then the new life, and the new speculations it gave rise to and justified, were all strange and difficult for him to enter into gracefully or manfully. He had failed.

But not lost the estate. No, no, no! In his failure he had made a bold clutch at success, and won it—provided only——.

There Sleuth stopped to consider how the nephew was to be won by the very same man who could not win the uncle. Sleuth cast away all self-delusions, all pleasant fictions, and said to himself:

"All's true what the old man said, though he said it always so nastily, and I have been a pitiful sneaking coward. And that's why he couldn't abide me; I know now. Yes." And again Sleuth smiled—as if thinking he had no idea till now how useful the most unpleasant truth might be to a man's prospects in life.

And this time he smiled with some reason. For having seen and acknowledged in his inmost soul the ugly truth about himself—by one of those instinctive efforts which, probably, all men are more or less capable of under the stimulus of some tremendous event—he saw the business of winning Anthony was by no means so difficult as it looked. He and Anthony had met but once before; but that meeting had been in boyhood, when they had wandered together through a long day by the seaside, and formed a friendship which, though it died practically with the day, left behind a pleasant remembrance in the minds of both. Sleuth was glad of this now, very glad! Not merely because it made it more likely that Anthony was to be won, but because it made Sleuth feel he could more easily set to work in the right way to accomplish the task. He had to play a new part, involving, as he had read on playbills, "an entire change of performance," and he waited only for Anthony to turn and rise from the bedside that he might begin.

"Mr. Anthony," said the housekeeper, at last, in a low and kindly voice, when she found he still took no notice of them.

Anthony heard, and began to collect his thoughts and master himself; and after a brief pause, during which he did not once look round, he rose to his feet with a kind of shy dignity, and faced the speaker and Sleuth.

"Cousin Anthony!" said the latter, holding out his hand with some embarrassment, as if dubious how the advance would be received.

"Dick Sleuth!" was the cordial reply, which was accompanied by a vigorous grasp of the outstretched fingers—so vigorous and hearty, indeed, that they melted the half-congealed blood that generally seemed to circulate there, and made it move more responsively. And the two young men then looked into each other's faces—Anthony with an earnest, wistful expression, that seemed to say, "Whatever has happened, or is going to happen, don't let us forget we are of kin;" while Sleuth, after a momentary look, let his eyelids drop, and said, with some agitation:

"Isn't it horrible—this—this—murder?"

"Then he was murdered? Merciful heaven!"

The housekeeper lifted some of the gray hairs from the alderman's forehead, which were wet, and clung together, saying, as she did so;

"This is where he was shot. I washed the place, and tried to revive him; but, heaven help him, and forgive all his sins—he was quite gone!"

"Don't stay here, Anthony," said Sleuth, anxiously; "it makes me sick to see blood, or to think of it. Poor, dear uncle—he's dead, and we can't help him now."

"No," said Anthony, as he moved away unwillingly from the bedside, led by Sleuth's hand on his arm along the corridor, and down towards the dining-room on the ground-floor; but I wish we knew the miscreant who fired the shot."

"Yes—yes, so do I. But we shall never find him out."

"Why?"

"Because if such men once get away—as those have got away—we have no trace of them."

"I don't know about that, Dick. However, we must do what we can—both of us, you and I—to discover him."

"Oh, of course," assented Sleuth.

"I'd gladly devote half my life to hunt him down, if I could but get on his track," continued Anthony, with generous warmth. "What, a poor old man, just dropping into the grave,—just trying to make his peace with God—he to be hurried into eternity with his last prayer unsaid! Oh, it is horrible! horrible!"

"Yes—but you know, Anthony—if—if—it don't lessen the crime of—the—wretched—burglar—it does make a difference to us to know that uncle was dying, and had, as he said to me, again and again, not many minutes to live."

"Well, Dick, we won't discuss that. I can't—I haven't patience; it chokes me even to think of. He—the murderer—had better never try that plea on me himself, if he should be caught. I could almost sooner forgive him the murder than such a villanous excuse for murder! But, there, I didn't mean to get excited. And now, Dick," said Anthony, "let me give you my cordial thanks for your behavior to me. The man who brought me this,"—and here Anthony showed his cousin the brief note he had received from the alderman—"told me how anxious you were for me to make haste."

Sleuth looked confused at this praise, which puzzled him. Was it ironical? But he remembered that it must be Phillis who had done him so useful a service. His very confusion only the more favorably impressed Anthony, who now said to him:

"Well, Dick, how is it—you or I?"

This was asked with a faint approach to a smile.

"Upon my life, I don't know," replied Sleuth, feeling a growing confidence that his new course would be made the more easy if he could only watch how Anthony thought, spoke and acted, and then himself do just the same, without, however, any direct and palpable imitation.

"You don't mean that, Dick? You don't really mean that you are just as much in the dark as I am, and wondering whether you are to walk out of this house by-and-bye a sort of small millionaire, or a poor devil, without a shilling in money or a bit of influence among friends to help him on? You don't mean to say that?"

"Ah, but I do, though—I do, indeed!" rejoined Sleuth. "He said something about a codicil in my favor, which I fancy he meant was to smash some will in your favor made long before; but that is really all I know."

"And what do you think?"

"Think?"

"Yes. Come, Dick, don't mind speaking out. I am prepared for the worst; but can't deny that my affairs uncommonly need that I should rather prepare for the best."

"Well, Anthony, I shouldn't like to deceive you any more than I should like to be deceived; but I fancy—well, I may say I fear—to be candid, that you are the lucky one, and I the miserable unfortunate."

"Come, then, let us go together and look about the place, and see what we can find."

"No, Anthony—if I may make so bold—pooh! I thought I was talking to uncle. I was always frightened of uncle——"

Anthony interposed, saying:

"I can understand that, Dick; and, perhaps, it had been better for me if I had felt a little more of your natural respect, and——"

"There now, Anthony, don't say any more; I am ashamed enough of it, that I can tell you. I wouldn't for ten times the fortune do it all over again. No, no, no!"

There was so much emotion in Sleuth's face and tone as he uttered these last words, that Anthony could not but wonder, and the incident tended powerfully to enhance his liking for Sleuth; for he had just heard enough, in his banishment, of his cousin's general behavior, to guess at his besetting fault—servility, and to appreciate not only the candid confession just made, but the manly change of view and determination it implied as regards the future.

Sleuth walked to the window as if to look out, but really to compose his features, which he felt were distorted by the thoughts of the murder, that had come back then most vividly; and while there he could not but remember the coat, and gaze earnestly in the direction of the truss of hay, which was still by the wall, and undisturbed, he thought.

"Anthony," he said, as he returned, "I have been thinking what we had best do under these queer circumstances. We will send off to the lawyer. I shouldn't be surprised if he knows all about the matter. And whether he does or not, he ought to be here to join us in our search."

"All right, Dick. Do it quickly; for I have some very private and very ugly reasons in my pocket for wanting to know my real position."

"I will. You wait here till I come back."

"Very well. Give me a light for my pipe. I have been a bit shaken by what I saw upstairs, and if I try to get rid of my uncomfortable feelings about the affair, don't fancy me heartless, Dick, I really do believe I loved the old man—ay, better than I thought I did. But there, come, the light! Is your tobacco good?"

"Capital."

"Then I'll revel in the enjoyment of it, if I can, and try to avoid castle-building out of the smoke, till I know the bare, unimaginative fact whether I am heir or no, as you fancy."

"That's right," said Richard Sleuth, as he hurried off, secure now, he thought, of a brief space in which to consider how he should get rid of that dangerous coat,

"Dick!" was soon called after him. Sleuth did not want to hear, and went on into the hall.

"Dick!" resounded a second time, and louder. Sleuth stamped his foot in his bitterness and rage, but turned; for to offend Anthony might even be more dangerous than to delay the removal of the coat.

"Dick," said Anthony to him, as Sleuth repassed the threshold, "I have got an odd idea. You won't be offended, I am sure, if I tell you what it is."

"Not very likely, Anthony," said Sleuth, showing his beautifully white teeth in his grim effort to construct a smile.

"Well you say, Dick—and of course you wouldn't say it if it were not true—that you think I have the best chance."

"More than that," said Sleuth.

"Never mind the more. I don't want, if I can help it, to humbug myself, so we'll say I've the best chance. Now, then, for my proposal. We are cousins—we might say brothers at one remove—we have both been led to expect great things from the poor old man who lies now so——"

Here Anthony broke down once more, and Sleuth had to guess the rest of the sentence as well as he could.

"Well, Dick, this is it. Without any more circumlocution or nonsense," resumed Anthony: "if you get this property, shall I find a friend in you?"

"Oh, Anthony! Can you ask?"

Anthony saw the tears in his cousin's face, and did not want to ask that question again. He went on:

"And if I get it, may I, too, be sure you will look for a friend in me?"

"Oh, Anthony, you—you—you are too good to me. I know what you mean. And there's One above——"

Sleuth stopped in the very beginning of an impassioned appeal to heaven, warned not so much by Anthony's looks as by his own checking thoughts of the mistake he was making, and so he ended by saying, "I don't like sentiment, do you?"

"No," said Anthony.

"Neither do I. And if you catch me at it again, I wish you'd tell me."

Anthony laughed, and Sleuth laughed, and under cover of this false emotion gave way suddenly to an almost idiotic burst of laughter, which lightened the terribly true emotion he did feel, and which was constantly threatening to unsettle his reason. Sleuth was very glad thus to be able to relieve himself, but he did not forget to explain:

"I have scarcely had a wink of sleep these last three days and nights, and now I must ease myself somehow."

"That's right," said Anthony. "And I, with less put upon me, want a smoke to ease myself, too, while you send for the lawyer, to see what Dame Fortune is going to do with us. We are bound to her wheel, Dick, and must go on. I only hope, in one of her sudden, mad turns, she mayn't drive right over us."

As the smoke from Anthony's pipe began to curl and wreath over his head, and he watched the fantastic shapes, he said to himself:

"Dick's a good fellow, after all! oh, yes, or he'd never receive me in this friendly way. I won't forget it, I promise him, if all be as he says. And, if not, why then hang me if I care much now whether he or I gets the best spoil in the division—for division I prophesy it will be."

At the same moment Sleuth was saying to himself:

"I'm glad I didn't say anything definite about what I should do; for when the codicil turns up it might be awkward. Ha! I smell a rat—he had got the codicil in his pocket, and this is his artfulness to extract a sweeping promise out of me before he owns to know anything but that he is heir!"

CHAPTER X.—SLEUTH BEGINS TO DISCOVER IN HIS OWN CASE WHAT ANTHONY MEANT WHEN HE SAID THEY WERE BOUND TO THE WHEEL.

WITH a wondrous sense of relief that he had got through his first interview with his cousin (who represented to Sleuth for the moment the whole world, which was to be lulled to the belief that he, Sleuth, had nothing to do with the murder), with a truly wondrous sense of relief and of mastery of fate and circumstance, Sleuth hurried to remove the coat from its temporary hiding-place.

He did not know where to put it or what to do with it. Destruction would take too long, and be difficult beside. He could not eat that as he had eaten the pieces of paper, which might have revealed his motive for deciding to make away with the old man before the document could be properly witnessed. He could not burn it: the smell would tell the whole house. And to cut it into small, almost indistinguishable pieces, ready for dispersion at the first chance that offered, even that was not practicable during the next few minutes. He must, then, again hide it for an hour or two, or possibly longer. The place that he continually thought of, his box, was as continually set aside. Of course that would be searched if suspicion should happen to be directed against him. No, the box was not to be trusted to. He must get it from under the hay, and use his eyes as he ran along to discover some secure but temporary spot of concealment, perhaps till the next night should give him the cover of darkness.

But while he is thus planning as he moves along, he is met by the housekeeper, who, to his surprise, is carrying a tray with breakfast-things.

What is there in this to make Sleuth uncomfortable? He wants breakfast himself badly enough, and of course Anthony wants it too. Why, then, his alarm? It is because he has never before seen her attempt to do such a thing herself. She is not very strong, and there are others about her who always performs such tasks—Phillis, if no one else.

Sleuth cannot fulfill his first intention to evade speaking to her, in order that he may get safely to the stableyard. No; he must at least make sure that she has no special business just now with Anthony.

"Was it she," he asks himself, "who was outside the door when I reloaded the pistol, and when I let fall the candle and destroyed the old man's paper?"

The question is too tremendous for him to leave it unanswered. He goes right on to where she has stopped a moment, either to rest her burden, or, as he suspects, to let him get out of the way.

"That's very good of you, Mrs. Milton, to think of us poor famished youths. I suppose it is for Anthony and me."

"Y—yes, Mr. Sleuth," replied the housekeeper, in some embarrassment, which did not, however, conceal that she was in no very good humor.

"Oh, well, then, I'll go back with you. There's no hurry. I was going to send for the lawyer, to make a search through the house."

The housekeeper said nothing, looked grim, and did not even thank him for his courtesy when he opened, first, the swing doors that shut out the smell of the kitchen, and then the door into the dining-room, where Anthony was.

"Breakfast, Anthony!" exclaimed Sleuth, with a certain gaiety of manner, he at the same time taking care to be first at the place where Anthony was sitting in a cloud of smoke, so that not even a look should escape him. "Hang the lawyer, and wills and codicils, say I! I want my breakfast just now worse than anything else in the world, so I have come back to get it before going into business."

"I'm hungry, too," said Anthony, putting his pipe on the corner of the mantel-piece; "but let me have a wash first, for I was fetched out of bed by your messenger, and feel terribly knocked up."

"To be sure," said Mrs. Milton. "I'll ——"

Whatever she might be going to say or to do, Sleuth determined, at all events, she should say or do in the presence of both; so he said boldly, though not looking at the person he addressed:

"Cousin Anthony and I will go up together, Mrs. Milton, if you will be kind enough to go and send us in something nice in the way of meat to eat with our breakfast."

Mrs. Milton looked at him a moment with an odd kind of smile flittering over her not smiling kind of face; then she put her hand in her pocket and took out something which she laid on the table, saying:

"Look, Mr. Anthony, I found that on the bed, and it was still burning."

"What is it?" said Anthony, jumping up.

"Well, I declare," said Sleuth, "if it is not the wadding out of the mur—— out of the rascal's pistol that shot the old man. It must be taken care of. Don't touch it, Anthony—I won't. Mrs. Milton had better keep it till the coroner's inquest—for I suppose there will have to be an inquest."

Sleuth's voice dropped towards the close of the sentence almost into a meditative tone, as if he were asking himself the question.

"My cousin's right, Mrs. Milton. We had best keep things exactly as they were, till some one who is authorized has gone over the house."

The housekeeper took the piece of wadding, and replaced it in her pocket, saying:

"I found it—when I first discovered what had happened—in the bedroom, just before I went along the corridor and saw you, Mr. Anthony, go into the safe-room."

"I, Mrs. Milton! My dear lady, you are dreaming!"

"I'm too old for dreaming, young gentleman. My dreaming days are long gone by. I daresay you were too much excited to know exactly where you went or what you did. I knew you by your coat."

"I assure you ——" began Anthony, good humoredly.

"Come, Mrs. Milton," interposed Sleuth, "we haven't a moment to lose. Now, Anthony."

And before there was time to continue the discussion, the two young men had left the room.

"Odd! I don't half like it," communed Mrs. Milton with herself. "He must know he went through that room. But, there! don't I know him well? Haven't I known him for years—as true-hearted and pleasant-spoken a young man as can anywhere be found?"

* * * * * *

Scarcely two minutes elapse before Sleuth returns, having washed rapidly, and left Anthony to perform the same process at leisure. The instant he gets inside the door, he shuts it, and glances hurriedly about. Then he goes with swift foot to a corner of the room, where he sees Anthony's light-colored coat hanging on a chair. His hands dive into the pockets and bring forth a number of papers, which he hurriedly examines. Most of them be puts back into the coat pocket, with the slightest possible examination. At last he retains only three documents—letters. Then, while gazing eagerly towards the door in fear of Anthony's return, he feels for his memorandum-book in a side pocket of his own coat, and begins to write, thinking to himself the while—

"These may prove of value some day. Yes—all alike. All threatening! County courts—judgment—prison—no delay, unless prompt payment. All dated within the last few days, suggest powerful motives for—for what?" Sleuth did not tell himself that. He was greatly struck to find how things lent themselves to guard him, if suspicion should arise, by casting the guilt on Anthony. He didn't want to create circumstances of that kind—so, at least, he said to himself. But if they did exist, was he to be such a fool as to run his neck into the noose merely because somebody was threatened? Yes, there was a motive why Anthony might have been inclined to somewhat sweeping measures if he had, on his arrival, found the codicil, and had seen his only way was to destroy it, and destroy the author of it at the same time, so that no inconvenient questions might be asked. Sleuth almost began to persuade himself that Anthony must have been in intention just that which he, Sleuth, was in fact; and that it was chance only, or Dame Fortune, as Anthony had said, which had decided which of the two should strike the fatal blow.

But the codicil! It is that he sought when he lighted upon those dunning letters. It is not in the coat! Anthony, then, he fears, did not, after all, got hold of the precious document! Will he ever recover it? Has he sold his soul to the evil one for nothing?

But now he must venture once more towards the stable-yard. Time is passing—the groom will begin work—perhaps may want the hay—and then ——

Anthony opens the door, and again Sleuth is chained; for even if he dared venture to excuse himself, as before, to get away, there is the housekeeper coming in with the dishes suggested by Sleuth's order, as if determined that she alone would wait on the young men.

He wipes the cold sweat from his face, as he fancies there is something ominous in all this; but with good grace he sits down, and does the honors of the table in the best manner he can, chatting the while on all sorts of subjects except those which occupy his real thoughts.

While Anthony drinks a cup of coffee, he sees Sleuth's eyes fall upon the pistol he had brought into the house, and laid down on the sideboard.

"You're looking at my pistol. Where d'ye think I got it?"

"Can't guess," said Sleuth, stooping down, as if to give a more vigorous cross-cut at some hard piece of meat on his plate.

"That's the property of one of our burglar acquaintances——"

"Not——," began Sleuth.

"No—not the one that did the bloody work, certainly; for I found it loaded as I ran after them, and I fired it in the hope of bringing my man down. You see, it is empty."

"And here is mine," said Sleuth, who had been trying to create this very opportunity. He took the weapon from his pocket, scarcely conscious of the danger of so carrying it, since he had learned to confront other dangers. "Uncle gave it to me, and I was rather uncomfortable about it; yes, and I said so, and he got angry, and fired one of the barrels himself at the burglar, but missed him—"

"And then the burglar shot back. I understand now. I'm glad to hear this, Dick. Bad as the act was, it is not so bad as I thought. If I were a burglar—mind the if, Dick—I'm afraid I should lose my temper under fire, and let fly. Ain't you horrified to hear me say so?"

Sleuth's only direct answer was a smile; but presently he added:

"You see, one barrel is still loaded." Then, remembering his alarm about the hand that touched the door while he was reloading, he said: "And very glad I was to know that I had another shot, when I found what had happened, and thought, perhaps, the villains might come back. I never looked so closely at anything in my life as I looked at that other barrel to make sure; for you see, Anthony, I didn't know much about pistols—no, not though the alderman tried to make me understand."

"Yes, Dick, I see it's loaded. And, ah! here's Mrs. Milton coming again. I propose we give up our trophies to her."

But Mrs. Milton declined to touch the loaded weapon. So to quiet her, Sleuth suggested to Anthony it might be fired off, and Anthony, not seeing the matter to be of the slightest importance, went to the window and fired; so dissipating, to Sleuth's intense satisfaction, all danger of discovery through the examination of the charge, which might have been thus proved to be the handiwork of one little acquainted with the process; a not unreasonable fear—for the pistol went off with such violence as to make an extraordinary loud report—and almost dislocated Anthony's fingers. He only smiled, however, as he shook his hand a little, and said:

"Uncle must have guessed the very sort of men that would be coming for this, when he put in such lots of powder!"

* * * * * *

Again Sleuth sets out on his errand, professedly to send for the lawyer; but, really, in addition, to remove the coat. He looks at his watch, and almost jumps in affright.

"Twenty minutes past five! I must stop for nothing now."

He goes rapidly along into the yard, listening, as he moves through the different passages, to hear where the servants have got to since the calming down of the first excitement on the discovery of the murder. He hears them talking in the room that served the alderman's small establishment as a kind of servants' hall, and he listened carefully, to count up the different voices he wanted to hear there—the housekeeper's, Phillis's, the cook's, and groom's. He had to wait some minutes before he could tell accurately how many of these were assembled; but at last he satisfied himself that Phillis alone was absent from the animated discussion then going on, and even she might be there; but if so, was unaccountably silent.

As he wondered where she was, and paused for a moment in his desire to be sure that she might not know what he was about to do, a new thought struck him: Might he not learn by his listening if he were suspected, however remotely? The thought was at once so fearful and so tempting, that he did stay two or three minutes, but with no result that could satisfy him, one way or the other, on that subject; though what he heard was alarming enough. The gardener was saying:

"Well, I don't mind who knows it, but I've a sent for Dr. Pompese; he's a magistrate and master's friend, and he'll see into things."

Breathlessly he listened, as if spell-bound, for yet another minute. The housekeeper spoke next:

"Did any of you see a figure in a light coat, like Mr. Anthony's, moving about!"

Sleuth leaned his forehead against the stone wall to cool it, while he waited for the answer, which, however, was a general "No."

Again he moved along the tortuous course he was pursuing to reach the stable yard, without passing so near the servants' hall that they might see him or hear his steps, when he met Phillis full in the face just as he had reached the external door. He could have roared at her like a madman, but was constrained by overwhelming circumstances to speak gently and smile.

"Phillis, I was looking for you."

She said nothing as she answered his curious glance by one still more strange. So he went on:

"Cousin Anthony and I both think the lawyer should be sent for immediately, to go with us all over the house, and look for any papers the old men may have left."

"Richard, did you find the codicil with the help of that key I get for you."

"Yes—at first."

"And was it as—as you expected?"

"Yes," said Sleuth, uneasily, and wondering if it were a part of Phillis's nature to be always asking ticklish questions at the most dangerous of times.

"I understand, then, Richard. You have got it, and don't want me to know!"

"Don't be a fool, Phillis, and make me angry with you. The paper has been taken out of the safe, with everything else in it, by the burglars; and my only chance now is to wait and watch, in the hope of getting it once more."

"Is that the truth, Richard? Can you look in my face and say it is the truth?"

"Phillis, you little fool—there, I am looking. And there—you know now, I suppose, what that kiss means—that I want only to recover the cedicil, by hook or by crook, to fulfill all my promises to you. But run—send off the groom for the lawyer; the groom, mind, for he will go quicker than the gardener."

Phillis went to obey his bidding; and he stood to listen, measuring with his eye every second upon his watch, to give himself occupation.

"Ha, yes! there is the horse; and now the gate opens. He's off! I am safe; for the man I most feared is out of the way."

He went now, through a little door used, into the stable-yard, and there was the truss of hay just as he had left, but in sight from the windows. A new measure of prevention occurred to him. He ran back into the hall, where a cloak was hanging, and put it on, and then returned to the door.

He stopped for a moment, as if fearing those few yards of rough gravel he had to cross might be taking him from safety to danger—from life to death; but they must be crossed. What should he do, supposing the worst, and that there were eyes, at the windows watching?

He began to walk stately up and down, as if to cool his heated brow and enjoy a few minutes of meditation alone, after the fearful excitement of the night. As he walked, what more natural than that he should be attracted by the smell of the sweet hay? He picks a bit out of the truss in passing, but carelessly, as if thinking of anything rather than the hay. Then he stops meditatively—now in one part of his walk, now in another, and now by the corner of the truss. Suddenly he sees something about his foot—a lace broken, perhaps. He stoops to set it right. When he rises, he trembles; for under his cloak hange the coat on his arm.

But he has it! All the fears of the last hour or two are gone—dispelled into the air. Oh, he is safe enough! All will be right in time. If only he is steady—immovable—whatever may happen to frighten for the moment.

His walk ceases. Of course Anthony must not be left alone. That would be inhospitable. He repasses the threshold of the little door, and, knowing not else what to do, determines to trust the coat to his box for an hour or two—not longer.

Phillis again? What can ail her? She must be watching him. Ha! perhaps she had never ceased to watch him—had seen him stoop, and suspected he was not the man to stoop for nothing. Filled with this thought as he sees her advancing, and being at the time close by a dark angle of the dark passage, he drops the coat from under the cloak just behind him, pushes it into a heap by a backward movement of his foot, and advances to meet Phillis, throwing off his cloak, and saying, as he passed her:

"I was quite cold, now I am warm again. I wish I could get a bit of sleep."

Phillis said not a word as she passed, and the spot was too dark to distinguish the expression of her features.

Sleuth went on, but more and more slowly, till he heard her afar off. Then he stopped—listened—yes, he was quite sure Phillis was out of sight and hearing. Stay, there are other steps, or else Phillis returns. How terrible that he can't see from where he is. More steps. Not one person alone is passing, but one—two—three.

Again silence.

Then Sleuth ran back to fetch the coat, but stopped paralyzed, both his hands moving as the hands of an idiot might move to and fro in the air, and murmuring:

"Where is it? Gone! gone! gone!"

"WAISTS."—One of the latest Yankee "notions" of which we have heard, is that of a Dr. Dio Lewis, the principal of what we may term a Hygienic educational seminary for young ladies, at Lexington, Mass., wherein Theodore D. Weld is one of his associates. We hear that a recent closing examination at this seminary, one of the exercises (if we may so characterize it) consisted of a careful measurement of the waists of the pupils respectively, and a comparison of the result in each instance, with a record preserved of a similar measurement at the opening of the term, "showing an average net gain of 2¾ inches in circumference since the 1st of October last." Some girls who entered upon the term invalids, had meantime been trained to walk ten miles without fatigue, while their intellectual progress had kept full pace with their physical.

EFFECT OF STRIPPING A COUNTRY OF ITS TREES.

THE summer heats are beginning to dry up the springs and brooks which were lately so full and noisy, and the attention of observing people is again turned to the fact of the diminution, year by year, of the quantity of water in our streams at certain seasons, in consequence of stripping the country of its trees, and converting the forests into pastures and tilled fields. Almost everywhere our rivulets and rivers show, by certain indications in their channels, that they once flowed towards the sea with a larger current than now. If we go on as we now do, we shall at length see many of our ancient water-courses as nearly obliterated as Addison found them in Italy.

This denuding a country of its trees has made the rivers of Spain for the most part mere channels for the winter rains. The Guadalquivir, which some poet calls a "mighty river," enters the sea at Malaga, without water enough to cover the loose black stones that pave its bed. The Holy Land now often misses the "latter rain," or receives it but sparingly, and the brook Kedron is a long, dry ravine, passing off to the eastward from Jerusalem, to descend between perpendicular walls, beside the monastery of Mar Saba, to the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea. Mr. Marsh, in his very instructive book, entitled "Man and Nature," has collected together a vast number of instances, showing how, in the old world, the destruction of the forests has been followed by a general aridity of the country which they formerly overshadowed.

Whether there are any examples of frequent rains restored to a country by planting groves and orchards, we cannot say; but we remember, when traveling at the west, thirty-five years since, to have met a gentleman from Kentucky, who spoke of an instance within his knowledge, in which a perennial stream had made its appearance, where, at the early settlement of the region, there was none. Kentucky, when its first colonists planted themselves within its limits, was a region in which extensive prairies, burnt over every year by the Indians, predominated.

The causes which operate to make the rains more frequent, and the springs more regularly full, in a well-wooded country, are probably more than one. Under the trees of a forest a covering of fallen leaves is spread over the ground, by which the rains are absorbed, and gradually given out to the springs and rivulets. The trees also take up large quantities of this moisture in the ground, and give it out to the air in the form of vapor, which afterwards condenses into clouds and falls in showers. All the snows, likewise, that fall in forests are more slowly melted and sink more gradually and certainly into the earth than when they fall on the open fields. On the other hand, the rains that fall in an unwooded region run off rapidly by the water courses, and that portion of them which should be reserved for a dry season is lost.

In some parts of the country, with a view of supplying the deficiency occasioned by the gradual diminution of water in the streams, they are beginning to resort to the old method of collecting the rains into reservoirs. In a part of Massachusetts, contiguous to this state, the county of Berkshire, the owners of the paper-mills, on what is called the Windsor branch of the Housatonic, have already begun the construction of a basin on that stream, at a spot in Windsor, just above a series of cascades, sometimes called Windsor Falls, and sometimes the Wacconah Falls. Here the mouth of a small valley, through which the stream descends, is to be closed by a wall of massive masonry, resting upon a stratum of the original rock.

No mound of earth would answer the purpose, nor wall of stone resting upon earth, since, if that were by any possibility to give way before the water pressing against it, the time of copious rain, a flood would be let loose which would carry destruction to the villages below. By this reservoir a hundred acres or more will be covered to a great depth, and as it is the centre of an extensive water-shed, it will be filled in rainy weather in a very short time.

This example will probably be followed in other parts of the country, by those who desire to secure a supply of water for their mills in such a season as we had last summer, when the want of water was very seriously felt.

A CANNY SCOTCH LADY.

SHE was penurious in small things, but her generosity could rise to circumstances. Her dower was an annuity from the estate of Mortonhall. She had a contempt for securities, and would trust no bank with her money, but kept all her bills and bank notes in a green silk bag, that hung on her toilet glass. On each side of the table stood a large white bowl, one of which contained her silver, the other her copper money, the latter always full to the brim, accessible to Peggy, her handmaid, or any other servant in the house—for the idea of any one stealing money never entered her brain. Indeed, she once sent a present to her niece, Mrs. Cunninghame, of a £50 note, wrapped up in a cabbage-leaf, and intrusted it to the care of a woman who was going with a basket of butter to the Edinburgh market. My friend, Mrs. Cunninghame, related to me this, and the following historiae of her aunt. One day, in the course of conversation, she said to her niece, "Do ye ken, Margaret, that Mrs. Thomas B—— is dead? I was gaun by the door this morning, and thought I wad just look in and speer for her. She was very near her end, but quite sensible, and expressed her gratitude to God for what He had done for her and her fatherless bairns. She said 'she was leaving a large young family with very small means, but she had that trust in Him that they would not be forsaken, and that He would provide for them.' Now, Margaret, ye'll tell Peggy to bring down the green silk bag that hangs on the corner of my looking-glass, and ye'll tak' twa thousand pounds out o' it, and gi'e it to Walter Fearier for behoof of these orphan bairns; it will fit out the laddies, and be something to the lassies. I want to make good the words, 'that God wad provide for them,' for what was I sent that way this morning, but as an humble instrument in His hands?" Miss Trotter had a friendship for a certain Mrs. B——, who had an only son, and he was looked on as a simpleton, but his relatives had interest enough to get him a situation as clerk in a bank, where he contrived to steal money to the extent of £500. His peculations were discovered, and in some days he would have been hanged, but Miss Trotter hearing the report started instantly for Edinburgh, went to the bank and ascertained the truth. She at once laid down £500, telling them, "Ye maun not only stop proceedings, but ye maun keep him in the bank in some capacity, however mean, till I find some other employment for him." Then she fitted the lad out, and sent him to London, where she had a friend to whom she wrote, offering another £500 to any one who would procure him a situation abroad, in which he might gain an honest living, and never be trusted with money. After all this was settled, she went herself and communicated the facts to his mother.

MR. R. W. EMERSON has thus expressed himself concerning a volume of the scraps of humor and wise sayings of the late President Lincoln: "He is the author of a multitude of good sayings, so disguised as pleasantries, that it is certain they had no reputation at first but as jests; and only later, by the very acceptance and adoption they find in the mouths of millions, turn out to be the wisdom of the hour. I am sure, if this man had ruled in a period of less facility of printing, he would have become mythological in a very few years, like Æsop or Pilpay, or one of the Seven Wise Masters, by his fables and proverbs. But the weight and penetration of many passages in his letters, messages, and speeches, hidden now by the very closeness of their application to the moment, are destined hereafter to a wide fame. What pregnant definitions; what unerring common sense; what foresight; and, on great occasions, what lofty and more than national, what humane tone!"

MURDER OF REV. DR. VOLKNER.

From recent files of Auckland, New Zealand, papers we learn the particulars of the horrible murder of the Rev. Dr. Carl Sylvius Volkner, at Opotiki. The victim was a missionary clergyman, a native of Cassel, Germany, and a student of the Hamburg Missionary College.

Having had occasion to go to Auckland, Mr. Volkner left that port on his return to Opotiki, on the 26th of February, as passenger on board the schooner Eclipse, accompanied by another missionary, the Rev. T. S. Grace. The master of the vessel, Capt. Levy, states that, on the 1st of March, he sailed up the river Opotiki, to Opotiki, and came alongside the wharf and elsewhere kept by his brother Mr. Samuel Levy. At that place, he found a great crowd of the Maoris waiting on the bank. Mr. S. Levy, with Tevoid, the interpreter, came on board, and said that the Maoris had all taken an oath the day before to kill every minister or soldier who came there. Capt. Levy himself went ashore, and found that this report was true. Some plans for enabling the two missionaries to escape were proposed, but their execution was deferred until night, as the vessel was closely watched by the hostile multitude on shore. Later in the day the Maoris, being in irresistible force, ordered Captain Levy, with his crew and passengers, to come out of the vessel. As soon as they did so, the Maoris seized Mr. Volkner and Mr. Grace and began to tie them with ropes, but desisted from this when Capt. Levy interfered. The two reverend gentlemen, however, with four sailors, the crew of the schooner, were shut up in a warehouse, or large hut, guarded by twenty Maoris with double-barreled guns. The night was passed in delirious among the Maoris as to the fate of their captives. In the morning Capt. Levy and Mr. S. Levy were told that the two missionaries would be shot. Capt. Levy in vain remonstrated and begged the Maoris to refrain from this bloody act.

The savages, changing their minds concerning the mode of death, about ten o'clock dragged Mr. Volkner to a tree and hung him. They did not tie his hands or his feet, but left him to dangle in the air for nearly an hour, during which time some of the natives were hauling at his legs to get off his boots and trousers, sharing what was in his pockets, whilst he hung over their heads and one of the bruins put on his trousers while he hung over him. After letting the body hang for some time they lowered it down and carried it to the side of the church, where they had a place fenced in. Here they spread the body out in the form of a cross (the poor fellow was not then dead, as symptoms of life were still observable). They then proceeded to cut off the head and to drink the blood as it ran out of the head and body. There was a frightful scramble among the women as to who should have the most of his blood. With the blood that dropped to the ground they painted their faces; the chief Kereopa, taking the eyes out of the head with his fingers and eating them before the whole crowd to show them an example. The body was then thrown to the dogs, but afterwards thrust down a drain.

Capt. Levy says: "When evening came the savages assembled in the Roman Catholic missionary chapel, where the bleeding head of Mr. Volkner was placed on the pulpit, and they performed a savage dance before it, yelling and screaming with the utmost fury. All through that night the same disgusting orgies were continued in and around the churches; the wretches, both men and women, assembling in different places, every half hour, to the sound of a kind of infernal whistle, accompanied by the ringing of the church bells."

Dr. Grace was rescued by the timely arrival of a British gunboat.

IGNATIUS BOURGET, ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOP OF MONTREAL.

RIGHT REV. IGNATIUS BOURGET,
Roman Catholic Bishop of Montreal.

DR. BOURGET, the revered Catholic Bishop of Montreal, is a native of that city. He was ordained priest November 30, 1815, and after filling for some time the extremely difficult position of secretary to Dr. Lartigue, the first bishop of the diocese, whose early administration was one series of troubles, Mr. Bourget was, on the 16th of March, 1837, made Bishop of Telmesse, and coadjutor to the Bishop of Montreal. On the death of Dr. Lartigue, on Easter day, 1840, the coadjutor became second Bishop of Montreal, and has now for more than a quarter of a century administered the diocese. His career has been as peaceful as that of his predecessor was stormy. A man of deep personal piety, inspiring reverence and love, he has labored earnestly to advance the good of his flock. He has greatly increased the number of churches in the city and elsewhere founded new religious establishments for education and works of mercy, and given an impulse to good works of every kind. He invited to his diocese the Jesuits and Oblats, the former of whom have erected a noble college at Montreal.

VIEWS AT QUEBEC.

St. John's Gate.

REPAIRATIONS are continually going on at the fortifications of Quebec, and one of the latest improvements is the demolition of the old St. John's gate, to give place to a more substantial and doubtless graceful work. Mr. Sanston, the photographer, who lets no occasion pass to preserve views of old landmarks about to pass away, enables our readers to see St. John's gate before it was removed. The St. John's suburb lies without, and passing through, you proceed along St. John's street, about the busiest part of the town. This street, passing through the suburb, runs on to the Foye, and was, under the French regime, the favorite drive of the Canadian belles.

The city wall, with its rampart of solid masonry, extends on, to the right of St. Louis gate, and on the top, from St. John's gate ran a covered walk below the wall, within the city, to the esplanade, the parade ground, and park of Quebec, an habitual resort. The view from the top of St. John's gate is charming, especially at sunset, the river St. Charles where Cartier had his first fort, further on, the spires of the Indian Church of Loretto, and of Charlesbourg; and in the distance, lit up by the fading hues of the evening sun, the mountains of Beauport and Montmorenci.

The New Jail.

During through St. Louis gate, you pass several newly erected public buildings, quite creditable to Quebec, among others a quaint-looking edifice for soldier's orphans, and reach the renowned plains of Abraham, where the fate of French empire in America was decided. The monument at the right of our engraving, a solid, durable pile of masonry, with a granite column, surmounted by a bronze helmet and sword, marks the spot where the descendant of the Irish Catholic refugee fell, after adding a province to England's crown. Near it stands the new jail, not yet completed a solid edifice, which our engraving shows too well to need further description now, deferring to its completion a full account of its discussions, arrangement and management.

RESIDENCE OF MAXIMILIAN.

THE present residence of Maximilian, the Mexican French Emperor (a view of which we present this week), is situated in the suburbs of Chapultepec

THE RESIDENCE OF HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR MAXIMILIAN, CHAPULTEPEC, MEXICO.

"THE DEATH OF MILE PESHET."—SCENE FROM THE PLAY OF ARRAH NA POGUE, NOW BEING PERFORMED AT NIBLO'S GARDEN, NEW YORK CITY.

one of the oldest and most beautiful cities in Mexico. The castle was first occupied by the viceroy appointed by the Spanish government, and was afterwards used by the republic as a military school. Since it has been the residence of Maximilian it has been very much improved, and may now be considered one of the most magnificent edifices in Mexico.

ARRAH NA POGUE.

But few dramas have been produced in this country which have been so well received as this last work of Mr. Boucicault.

It was first produced in this city some two months ago, at Niblo's Garden, and has houses up to this date have been crowded to overflowing. The same success has attended its production in Philadelphia and elsewhere.

From the first scene to the last the spectators are held spell-bound by the deep interest of the story and are enchained by the mingled pathos and humor of the dialogue, which shows the literary ability of the author in the strongest light.

There is not a superfluous word in the play, and not an incident which does not help forward the action of the plot. It is out of simple materials that the dramatic interest of the drama is created, and nothing but becoming a spectator of the events which are gradually unfolded, and participating in the general sympathy which spreads through the audience, will make the reader conscious of the skillful manner in which the plot is description of which we gave in a recent number, has been manipulated. This week we present a sketch of the exciting scene of the death of Peasy, the Spy, who is buried by Shaun headlong into the sea at the Castle base.

TRINITY BAY AND HEART'S CONTENT.

TRINITY Bay and Heart's Content, N. F., have been made celebrated as the proposed terminus of the Atlantic Cable. We give in the present number illustrations of the locality where, had not the attempt to span the ocean proved a failure, the first news of success would have been hailed on this continent. Trinity Bay can hardly be considered a desirable harbor, and Heart's Content only aspires to the dimensions of a small fisherman's village.

LOUIS NAPOLEON'S LOVE AFFAIRS.

IT is interesting to follow the course of Louis Napoleon's amours. The first flame of the present Emperor of the French, was Eleonore Gordon, the daughter of a French captain who fell in Spain. Eleonore was the Prince's confidante in the Strasburg attempt. She was a singer, and made advances to the Pretender at Baden in the summer of 1836. It is said she had dreamed that she would become Empress of the French. In any case, she behaved very courageously. While Louis Napoleon was unsuccessfully harangueing the troops in the Finkmatt barracks, the gendarmes were already knocking at the door of Miss Gordon, whom Persigny had just informed that the Prince's enterprise was a failure. Miss Gordon burnt all the papers relerring to the émeute—the lists of conspirators, the correspondence with them; and when the gendarmes threatened to break the door in, she placed a chest of drawers against it, so as to complete her sacrifice at leisure. It was owing to her presence of mind, consequently, that so little came to light at the trial. Louis Napoleon held Miss Gordon in affectionate memory for a long time. When Louis Elsler visited him at Ham, in 1845, he spoke kindly about her. Almost simultaneously, Louis Napoleon had fixed his eyes on the Queen of Portugal, who was then fifteen years of age. The portrait of Maria da Gloria produced an impression on him, and he would not have been undisposed to become King of Portugal. But the master did not go on quite right, in spite of all the exertions made by his relatives. On December 14, 1838, Louis Napoleon, in an affable letter, declined the Portuguese candidateship in these words: "Convinced that the great name I bear will not always be a cause of my choice from my fellow-citizens, because it reminds them of fifteen glorious years, I calmly await, in a free and honorable land, the time when the nation will take back to its bosom those persons who were banished by the foreigners in 1815. The hope of some day being able to serve France as a soldier and citizen strengthens my mind, and is more in my eyes than all the thrones in the world."

At that time, however, a third lady was the rival of the singer and the queen. This was Mathilde, King Jerome's seventeen-year-old daughter. She seemed to have loved Louis Napoleon sincerely. When he was transported to America, on board the Andromede, he thought with sadness of his cousin, and wrote the following in his journal: "When I was taking Mathilde home a few months ago, we entered the park together, and saw flowers in two which had just been destroyed by a tempest—upon which I said to myself, that our marriage plans would be destroyed by destiny in a similar manner. What my mind then dreaded has since become the truth. How long ago that is now, this year, enjoyed the whole amount of felicity granted to us in this world!" Mathilde, when she heard of Louis' death, May 17, 1873, was a great beauty, of short stature, but well formed, with a head of classic shape, large, flashing eyes, and expressive, regular features. Her blooming complexion seemed as a relief to her light, flaxen hair, compared with her marriage with Prince Anatole Demidoff, soon after her marriage faded away, and her face assumed an expression of weariness. When Louis Napoleon became President, Mathilde did the honors in his house.

In 1840, Louis Napoleon was conquered of the lovely Lady S——. He wore her colors at the tournament which Lord Eglinton got up in Ayrshire. From the tournament he proceeded to Boulogne. At the fortress of Ham, whither he was conveyed after the Boulogne failure, he fell in love with a girl of the name of Boulenger, the daughter of a wholesale baker in the town. By her he had two children, of whom Miss Howard afterwards took charge, of course for a large allowance. Miss Howard was a perfect English beauty, who cost Louis a great deal. He made her Countess de Beaurepart, and purchased her a splendid villa near Paris. I say she had a finished wife; and the Parisians still remember, as if it were to-day, how straw was spread in front of the house of the President's mistress. It is reported that it was the Howard who, in the winter of 1851, drove the Empress to Scotland by her audacity; she took a look in the opera exactly opposite Eugenie, and marched her through her glasses in a most provocative way. The last of Napoleon's nurses, the Countess de Celle Mesdon, was the Sappho of all—she became Empress. In 1854, Prince Napoleon was for a while the admirer of Madame Kisselef, a charming Russian, to whom Cavaignac also paid court. Her rival would have defeated the general with the lady, who lived apart from her husband.

TIME AND ITS PERIODS.

The days of the week were named mostly in honor of heathen gods or objects of worship. Sunday from the Sun; Monday from the Moon; Tuesday is named from the Saxon god Tuisco; Wednesday from Woden, the god of battle; Thursday from Thor, the god of winds; Friday from Freja, another name for Venus; Saturday from the planet Saturn.

Now about the names of the months: January was called in honor of the god Janus, who was represented as having two faces, one before and one behind, thus looking back at the old year and forward to the new. The people on the first day of January crowned the image of Janus with a wreath and sacrificed to him an offering of fruit and wine. Friends also made each other presents, and it is from this custom we may have derived the fashion of our making New Year's presents.

February is named from a feast which was held for twelve days at Rome, called Februalia—meaning purification, as the people being then assembled from the sins of the whole year. The Romans first gave twenty-nine days to February; but when it was afterwards altered by the Decemvirs to the eighth month should be called in honor of Augustus, a day was taken from February and added to it, that it should not be inferior to July.

April is from the Latin word Aperio, to open, signifying the opening of the buds and leaves of trees. May is from Maia, the mother of Mercury; June so called in honor of Juno, the wife of Jupiter. July was named by Mark Anthony in honor of Julius Cæsar, the celebrated Roman Emperor; August was in honor of Augustus Cæsar, also another Roman emperor; September was so named from Septem, seven, it being the seventh month of the year, beginning as it did with March, which was the first month; October was so named is from Octo, the eighth month; November is from Novem, the ninth; and December from Decem, the tenth month.

The ancients did not reckon time as we do. In the age when Our Saviour lived, the day was measured at six in the morning, so that the third hour would be our nine o'clock. In Italy the day begins at sunset, and the clocks there strike twenty-four hours—that is, an hour past twelve they strike thirteen instead of one, and so on up to twenty-four o'clock, and then begin at one again. The Turks begin their day at a quarter of an hour after sunset.

Before clocks were invented, the Romans had queer ways of measuring time. They used to fill a tall glass vessel with water and let a small pool upon the top, the water then ran out through a small hole in the bottom, very slowly, the cork gradually sinking as it lost by marks on the side of the glass showed the flight of time. In the middle ages some persons used to burn candles and mark the passing time by their decrease. Then sun-dials were invented, and afterwards clocks.

POWER OF IMAGINATION.—Alexandre Dumas

published in a daily Paris paper a novel, in which she becomes supremely and happy, in spite of consumption. All the gradual symptoms are most touchingly described, and the gradual approach of death to the heroine. One day the Marquis de Dalemieu called on him.

"Dumas," said he, "do you mean to let your heroine die?"

"Of course; after such symptoms as I have described, how could she live?"

"You must change the catastrophe."

"Impossible."

"You must, for me, on your heroine's life depends my daughter's."

"Your daughter's?"

"Yes; she has all the various symptoms you have described, and which unfortunately for every one but a doctor or your novel, resolve her case fairly in your favor. Now, if you make your heroine live by a miracle, whose imagination has been deeply impressed, will live too. Come, a life to save is a worthy action."

"Not to be resisted."

Dumas changed his last chapters. His heroine recovered and was heavy. About five years afterwards Dumas met the old man at a party.

"Ah, Dumas!" he exclaimed, "let me introduce you to my son-in-law—he owes her life to you. Thank she to."

"Your son, handsome woman, who looks like Jeanne d'Arc?"

"Yes; she is married, and has had four children."

"And my novel your edition," said Dumas; "and we were quits."

HUMAN SKIN NAILED TO CHURCH DOORS.—There is a tradition handed down in several instances, that the doors of old churches had been covered with human skin as a punishment of sacrilege. The instance of Sardinia differs from every other in the existence of documentary evidence, and not traditional alone. Condemned, in the year 1410, to erect a church, and to wall round St. Worstein's cemetery, the great north doors of the cathedral—supposed to have been covered with the skin of a person who had struck the high altar. Those doors were removed since former times, and would soon have disappeared altogether. A portion of the supposed human skin was obtained, which consisted of the two-wood sides of the doors, had evidently been laid upon the doors when the animal and all its parts were entire, examined by a skilful microscopist, to be full of human. Portions of the skin from the doors were at Stuttgart and Cagliari was also obtained, and these were found also, on scrutiny examination, to be human skin. We, therefore, find the case made to the subject by Payne, in his "Diary," in respect to a visit, in the year 1851, to Rochester Cathedral, to see the Danes' door with which the doors, as it was believed, were covered. The appearance of such savage punishment in present times, and in parts of civilized Europe, is one of the facts which, however it might appear less extraordinary, but the discovery of such a practice in the instance of cathedral churches must be considered as very remarkable, more especially as no ancient law against sacrilege has been found by which any like penalty was shown to have been warranted.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

WHAT quadrupeds are admitted to halls, operas and dinner parties? White kids.

A COUNTRY girl, in speaking of the polka, said "she couldn't see nothin', but the fiddle was heavenly."

IF brooks are, as poets call them, the most musical of running waters, why are they never murmuring about?

"I SMILE, Ike," and "I might have been!" The former is the music of youth, sweet as the sound of silver bells; the latter, the plaint of age, the dirge of hope, and the inscription for a tomb.

A CERTAIN dissatisfied wife says, that her husband is such a knocker that he can't even say a few words of love without knocking his head in.

BOY IN A GRAMMAR CLASS.—"Of what gender is Thomas?" asked the teacher of the master's son. "Oh, he's gender a Susan?" Answer not the feminine gender, of course.

A SCHOOLBOY advocate who, in his broad speech, pronounced the word water, water, being asked to explain the meaning of the word, replied water and two fs, reefold.

"I'M in a pickle, but I spell manners with two n's."

To a lady who once complained of the insolence of some English coal-heavers, their employer replied by a request to weigh on his own account; adding:

"Sir, madam, to tell you the truth, we have failed in our efforts to get gentlemen to undertake the business."

THE surgeon of an English ship-of-war used to prescribe in every case of patients in all disorders. Having sailed one evening on a party of pleasure, he fell asleep, and some mischief was devised. The captain, who had not heard of the disaster, asked one of the tars how Jack was. "Why, sir," answered he, "he's drowned last night in his own medicine chest."

A CLERGYMAN called on a poor parishioner, whom he found in a miserable garret, with a sick son, a boy of about four or five years old. In the hope of consoling the afflicted father, he observed to him that "one so young could not have committed any very heavy offence, and that therefore he had no cause to suffer."

"Ah, sir," said the simple-hearted creature, "but Tommy was so sly—and they are all strangers there!"

THE following bit of sharp repartee from Rebecca creates no end record at Nottingham. A great scholar, as a charity scholar, put a stumbling question to the master, who was a poor scholar:

"Why is a goose like a pen?"

"No, sir, Sowerby, nobe—you are in the shilter."

"I mean a pen-ny, sir," the scholar explained.

"I can't be helped, sure I say you're in for the shilter, and there's an end on't."

At length Sowerby gave up, and said with a sigh: "Well, I'll get crush for it by-and-by."

"No, no, sir," continued the hard-dealing collector, "you'll only get crushed to the gallows."

THE father of Mrs. Siddons had always forbidden her to marry an actor, and of course she chose the member of all the unfortunate race who was the most secretly wedded. When Roger Kemble heard of it he was furious.

"Have I not," he exclaimed, "dared you to marry a player?"

The lady replied, with downcast eyes, that she had not directly done so.

"What, madam! have you not allied yourself to about the worst performer in the company?"

"Exactly so," murmured the timid bride; "nobody can call him an actor."

EPIDEMIC CONSEQUENT ON WAR.—The belief that epidemics frequently follow war is not unreasonable. After a long period of peace, the accumulation of miasmatic poison from decayed corpses of men and animals, and from the effluvia of the living, is checked by the open air life of the camp. The germ so situated by any one who has visited the battle-field of Solferino, or the Crimea, in the presence of great battles. As the putrid matter from a corpse is deadly and human subjects are peculiarly a quick flesh, or delicate membranes of the eye, so this fearful agency is destructive to the human race, and especially to the soldier. Typhoid epidemics in a more general and less fatal degree when following in the wake of the typhoid epidemics in the very worst form the ever active lungs.

Mental depression is accompanied by conditions of the body which expose the system to attack of almost every form of disease. Dysentery and diarrhœa, especially of civil wars say a writer on the subject, most frequently follow the battle of nations, while pyrexia morbid, ulcha relax their binding force upon activity and energy, and the malaria of the camp accident of history is as well aware of this fact as of the fearful mortality which has followed pestilence. The hill-top dens of prostitution audibly. Moral and physical degradation, the inevitable result of the demoralization of frightful rags and cast-off clothing from the hospitals and other foul spots of the Mediterranean and Europe. The symptoms of the disease are said to be identical in many respects with those of the cholera in the Levant, in Syria, and to a limited extent in Northern Africa. Such is the theory of the origin of the various epidemics.

EFFECTS OF SOLITUDE.—To be left alone in the wide world, with scarcely a friend—this makes the heart sick indeed. Even in the midst of the bustle of young and the affectionate, to close them too soon to the cold and cheerless grave. Shades of that very spot! The solitude of the aged, when, one by one, their friends have left them, and the grave has drawn its arms around them, and it is the overpowering sense of desolation that is felt. Even in the midst of the bustle of youth, when the warmest and dearest ties are severed by separation, how long time it is before they are broken, although they complain more; the young, "bear up a grief too great for them," and, with the keenest sad memories and melancholy anticipations, which often give their hues to their feelings in after life.

FRANK LESLIE'S

NEW FAMILY PAPER.

Over 100,000 Copies Sold
OF NOS. 1 and 2.

The success of this New Family Paper has been beyond all precedent, more yearly subscriptions having been received to it than to any publication of the times.

With Nos. 1 and 2 of THE CHIMNEY CORNER was presented, gratuitously, a magnificent plate, entitled—

Grand Reception of the Notabilities of the Nation at the White House, 1865.

The picture contains nearly 100 portraits of our most celebrated Statesmen, Statesmen and Generals, also of many of our most distinguished American ladies. The likenesses are admirable, having been taken from photographs by Brady.

This is the most costly gift plate ever presented by any publisher in the United States, having been produced at an expense of $10,000.

Every family should possess this truly national picture, and carefully preserve it, as it will increase in future generations the men who have rendered our great national unity. It is especially valuable, as it contains an excellent likeness of our late lamented President, introducing General Grant and his wife to Mrs. Lincoln. This costly plate is the first of a series which it is our intention to present to our regular subscribers.

The splendid gift plate will be sent to all subscribers.

With No. 4 was presented an outline engraving, being a key to the gift plate.

THE CHIMNEY CORNER is issued every Thursday in New York.

It is elegantly got, and back numbers can be had by ordering the same of any News Agent.

Death on the Rail.

CARELESSNESS and crime seem to be epidemic. Take the record of the month of August! It is crowded with the details of fraud, suicide, and murder—murder not of individuals singly, but by wholesale. We apply the term murder, with deliberation, to that whole series of "Deplorable Accidents," "Frightful Collisions," and "Shocking Casualties," which has crowded the columns of our daily newspapers for the past four weeks. Reliable statistics show that, for the eight months of this year, from January 1st to 1st of September, there have been not less than 128 railway "accidents," involving a loss of 266 persons killed, and 1,703 wounded! The following is the exhibit for the month of August alone:

Date.	Railway.	Number Killed.	Number Wounded.
1	Pennsylvania	1	—
4	Ohio and Mississippi	1	—
5	Connecticut and Passumpsic	1	27
10	At Stockport, N. Y.	1	1
11	Chicago and Great Western	1	6
12	Erie	2	—
13	Hannibal	15	20
15	Eastern Railroad	2	3
21	Chicago and Northwestern	4	8
22	New Haven and Stonington	1	5
23	Old Colony	1	7
24	Ohio Central	2	2
24	Pittsburg and Fort Wayne	40	70
25	Nashville and Decatur	1	—
26	Petersburg, Va.	2	—
26	Near Philadelphia	2	—
28	Hudson River	5	12
29	Pittsburg	1	—
	Total	83	161

It seems impossible for language to deepen the lesson taught by these appalling facts. People read the details of these horrors as for some interjunction from some source, between them and the danger involved in travelling. "What is everybody's business is nobody's," and the verdict of the various farcical coroner's juries that are convened after each slaughter, are accepted and acquiesced in because nobody feels called to prosecute the matter beyond their "lame and impotent conclusions." There is a vague notion abroad that there must be somebody to be punished for these wrongs, in the various railway companies to which the community have conceded great monopolies, but no one seems to discern where it is, or how it is to be reached. Most people know that if they should lose a leg or two in some "unfortunate collision," and should survive the catastrophe, they would be able to seize money enough to prosecute a rich and unscrupulous corporation, they might, if very fortunate, recover in damages, for some years out of his pocket, enough to pay his lawyer for attending to the prosecution. However such a result might gratify them personally, it is very doubtful if it would be without effect on the company prosecuted. Its officers would be none the more careful, its employés none the less careless.

The fact is, the public mind has settled down into the conviction that it is impossible to hold railway organizations answerable for losses or casualties, however flagrant. The consequence is an apathy, which gives immunity to carelessness, and a reckless disregard of the public safety and security.

Not long ago there was a railway "accident," so-called, in England. Curd issues was proven on the engineer of the train, and he was sentenced to penal transportation for seven years. On delivery of the sentence, the judge was asked if this conviction and punishment relieved the company from action for damages on the part of the sufferers from the accident. The reply was that it did not.

We hope that at least one good result will come out of the murderous exhibit of the month of August. It is not likely that the widowed mother of the poor newsboy who was killed by the falling of a bridge on the Long Island railway, August 28, will ever escape the officers or servants of most common before a criminal court, nor probably with her own lawyer pleading, on a suit for damages. It is hardly probable that the friends of any of the slaughtered on that occasion will ever be able to identify, or if they may be induced to accept a small consideration to maintain silence, rather than venture on the chances of litigation. But the fact that one only was cut in two, and the agreement, carelessness and recklessness? The evidence already before the world shows that the most criminal neglect and disorder prevailed on this road, with the full knowledge of its officers and directors. There was no safety system nor rules, or if so, they were not observed or enforced. The road was in such a barren scarem way, that made the escape of any single train from disaster next to a miracle. Here, then, is a case, in which the facts are so patent and palpable, that there can be no doubt or mistake. Why will not the public club together, raise a sufficient fund, and employ one of the mother of the murdered newsboy, and for her benefit, prosecute the Long Island railway, both before the criminal and the civil courts, especially for the personal punishment of the parties in guilt, and for damages? Let us see if wholesale murder on the rail cannot be checked, if not wholly abated. If the public mind be not sufficiently roused now to ensure some action of this kind, we may as well resign ourselves hopelessly to the admission that we have no rights railway companies are bound to respect, and that there is no recourse against railway corporations.

The Churches and Reconstruction.

NOTHING was more significant of the approach of the civil war than the action of the churches. All the great denominations had fought out their battles, and, with more or less of acrimony, had separated before the signal gun of the Charleston fort was fired. Charleston harbor. The Methodists, representing, perhaps, the "popular masses," were, we believe, the first to on loose from the men who adhered to a system which their founder had branded as comprising "the sum of all villainies." The Episcopalians, we still speak from recollection, only, with the best separate from the Southern dioceses. As the action of the churches premonished that of the states, it is interesting now, when the great question of "reconstruction" is uppermost, to know what their conduct seems most likely to be—whether, with insane animosity, they shall insist on retaining as an inclusion engaged to every principle of Christian charity (to say nothing of their well-being in the state), or whether, recognizing the inevitable logic of events, and the manifest decision of the God of Battles, they will accommodate their position to the actualities of the time, and join in the great work of accommodating society to the new conditions, and putting in practice the injunctions of Him whose followers they profess to be, and who declared his earthly mission to be "peace on earth and good will towards men." A daily contemporary (the Evening Post) has taken the pains to collect the utterances of representatives of the Southern churches on these vital questions, and we are free to say that they are quite as unsatisfactory as those offered by the political elements of the South. The Methodists of the South show the bitterest spirit and most intractable temper, not unnaturally, as they represent more especially, the "chivalry" of the South. But they are greatly weakened by the defection of the right-thinking men of their own denomination at home, and by the separation from them of the colored Methodists, who comprise a large part of their constituency. Even in the frontier states, as in Missouri and Kentucky, they show an audacious front, and one of their organs, the Episcopal Methodist, in combining the fraternal and magnanimous appeal of the northern Methodists for a restoration of good relations, declares:

> "A formal reunion with northern Methodism is to be avoided by the Southern Church at any cost. We cannot hold our southern vine. To connect it upon the Methodist Episcopal basis, with bishops appointed by the one position of ascendency, coming the meaning of the word, and willing to submit to the sentence of self-condemnation upon our principles, would be to surrender the very life of our discipline or a dominant church, which cannot be born and maintained but by those who are prepared with what it denominates 'the great evil'—the denial of slavery."

These sentiments, supported by the action of the southern officials of the church, would signify little; but, unfortunately, that action is significant. It proves the colored churches will fall off from the southern organization, and a minority of the whites will ally themselves with the northern branch of the church. The result will be an unnecessary prolongation of an unhappy contest, in face, and in disregard of every divine injunction, and the destruction of every spiritual, material and national interest.

The Baptists, perhaps popularly the next most influential denomination in the country to the Methodists, but in less degree, to the influences and prejudices which control the southern Methodists. They have made an overture to the Baptist Church of Washington, but the latter have insisted on full and equal communion, and on a reconciliation with the northern churches. These terms have not yet been accepted, and the southern Baptist, too, must count upon a separation of their colored membership, and the defection of their more enlightened and patriotic members among the whites.

The Presbyterians of the South are more liable, if possible, than either the Methodists or Baptists; but they, too, are not unanimous. Their organ, the Christian Observer, in referring to the "Reunion Board of Publication" of Philadelphia, which has now a depot in Richmond, says that, although "some of its publications are valuable standard works," it cannot recommend them to the southern churches, because of the attitude assumed by the General Assembly of the United States" (the North). The papers call for a speedy convocation of the southern General Assembly, and some writers even propose to extend their organization into the northern States, by inviting all who are dissatisfied with the deliverances by the General Assemblies on the loyalty and slavery questions to join them.

The Protestant Episcopal Church, from its organization and traditions, is most inclined to a moderate or "conservative" course of action. Its presiding bishop in the North has published a letter of recall to his southern brethren, in which he takes the ground that his church had taken no part, direct or indirect, in producing the war. All the bishops in the loyal states have been invited to sign this letter, but at least six have refused their signatures, being inclined "by a declamination not to be pledged in advance to any course which shall hinder each testimony as they shall feel that duty to God and the country and the future, may demand of them, in reference to the sins of slavery, schism and rebellion; and from an independent to seem anxious to purge themselves from the suspicion of having sanctioned the efforts of the Government to defeat and punish treason."

The southern Episcopalians seem generally to desire reconstruction, and as a whole, they may be taken to represent the landed and commercial interests of the South more than any other denomination, we think it not unlikely they will re-establish their ties of unity. The northern churches will not insist on anything so outrageously loyal that the repentant rebel may not accept with conscientious "mental reservations." Certainly not, if Bishop Hopkins has the framing of the tests.

Of the German Reformed Church, a northern minister of this denomination, who has lately preached in several of the German Reformed Churches of North Carolina, asserts that the great majority of the ministers and members of the southern classes had remained loyal to the Union throughout the war, and that it will be easy for the church to restore the ecclesiastical connection.

From this review it appears that a majority of the southern churches of all denominations will remain under an attitude of hostility to the North, which, in its political manifestation, is disloyalty and treason, covert if not open. They are, however, fighting, unnecessarily, a losing battle. They have lost their colored constituency, and the most enlightened among their white members. They are divided among themselves, while the northern churches remain a unit. Better for them to join in a hearty and Christian effort to promote the moral welfare of the country, than to prolong a fruitless controversy. The restoration of Christian fellowship by those who profess to be governed by high considerations of duty, will give a new impulse to the restoration of national quiet. And on this account such a restoration becomes doubly a duty.

THE Count Montalembert has made the history of our late war the text of a long and practical lesson to his countrymen, inculcating that liberty is not lawful, and that a great people may be convulsed and endangered, and yet saved without the intervention of Cesars or Napoleons, and maintain its integrity and its unity, by proving a fruitless controversy. The restoration of Christian fellowship by those who profess to be governed by high considerations of duty, will give a new impulse to the restoration of national quiet. And on this account such a restoration becomes doubly a duty.

THE Count Montalembert has made the history of our late war the text of a long and practical lesson to his countrymen, inculcating that liberty is not lawful, and that a great people may be convulsed and endangered, and yet saved without the intervention of Cesars or Napoleons, and maintain its integrity and its unity, by proving a fruitless controversy. "The American people have come from the pangs of fear and uncertainty." They have preferred honor and liberty to all other objects. "And they have given to the world a glorious example of a people which saves itself without a dictatorship or a proscription, without a Cesar or a Napoleon, without being place to the history or Itself." It is safe to say that the entire work was composed with the main purpose of protecting the country that had no able military despot to be a divine commission. If France, says Count Montalembert, "had been subjected for twenty years to the four years trial of the United States, "there would not have been a corporal or a mountebank capable of daring to be regarded as a Messiah, on the sole condition of ending the struggle and establishing, at any price, peace and order." The author of "The ruler of France seem to be assassinated to-morrow, half France would instantly demand that the other half should be put in prison."

REVIEWING a Life of President Lincoln, the London Athenæum has the following appreciative remarks on the man:

> "Of all the many awful qualities the most admirable, as well as the most serviceable, was that thorough trustworthiness which made him the object of love and faith for honesty throughout the land where impostors are hated and knaves laughed at. The strength of his great mission was the conviction of all classes that Abraham Lincoln could be be guilty of dishonest subterfuge or craftiness. Whatever his Christian name may have been, he was emphatically the man who stood to this universal appreciation of his unique character he owed the fabulous and power over a people who wisely decided to trust his moral strength and overlook the faults of his intellect."

More of English experiments in the way of "big things" have been financial failures. The "Great Eastern" is a failure; and we now learn that Thomas Turnell, a very bad failure from the start, has been sold to the London Railway Company for $1,000,000, or rather a fifth of the cost. In the Atlanto Telegraph to be added to the list of failures?

THE Patriot of Paris is still "down" on what it calls "the ex-grand Republic of the United States" "For a long article labors to demonstrate that not only are the men at the head of the government at Washington incapable of reorganizing the Union, but that no man or set of men can do it, since the task is an impossible one. Anarchy and confusion, the Patriot says, must continue to reign until the secession elements has time to organize, and then the North will be compelled to fight and willingly to admit the vital incompatibility between the two sections, will resist but feebly and ineffectually against this second appeal to force. The Patrie, it is only fair to state, simply reflects the sentiments of the France-American organ in this city, the Courrier des Etats Unis.

CHILI is undoubtedly the most advanced and prosperous, materially considered, of all the Spanish American Republics. Yet she is in other respects behind most of them, Guatemala, perhaps, excepted. In excess of religious bigotry she has hitherto sustained an unhappy notoriety. The great catastrophe of the burning of the church of the Jesuits at Santiago, her capital, a year or two ago, gave a severe blow to the religious bigotry which had been equally a distinction and a disgrace. It will be remembered that over 2,000 women were burned alive in the church, mainly because the attending priests in their anxiety to save the paltry ornaments of the altar, had closed some of the most important avenues of escape to the congregation. The city council resolved the church should not be rebuilt; the clergy insisted it should be, and out of this issue has sprung a broader one of religious toleration. The more enlightened part of the people insist on a change in the article of the Constitution, which prohibits the exercise, public or private, of any but the Roman Catholic religion. On the other hand, the Conservative party, spurred on by the priestly element, is bent upon maintaining this religious intolerance. The Government, which is itself liberally inclined, will probably be obliged to compromise the matter. The following is a bill presented by the Minister of Public Worship, and passed by the Senate:

"Art. 1.—It is declared that, by Article 5 of the Constitution, it is permitted to those who do not profess the Catholic, Apostolic and Roman religion, to practice their worship in edifices which are private property.

"Art. 2.—It is permitted to dissenters to establish private schools for the instruction of their children in the doctrines of their religion."

The leniency of the Government is, perhaps, shown in nothing more strongly than its treatment of the great majority of the leaders of the rebellion. Thus Gen. Beauregard is allowed to go back to his house in New Orleans, undoubtedly forfeited by his treason, and permitted to live there undisturbed. Yet he is the man who wrote, no longer ago than Aug. 3, 1862, to Gen. Martin, of South Carolina:

"In this contest we must triumph or perish, and the sooner we make up our minds to it the better. We now understand the hypocritical cry of 'Union and Constitution,' which means, and always did mean, 'spoliation and murder.'

"We will yet have to come to proclaiming this war 'a war to the knife,' when no quarter will be asked or granted. I believe it is the only thing which can prevent recruiting at the North. As to ourselves, I think very few will not admit that death is preferable to dishonor and ruin."

The extraordinary logic through which the Swedish priest Lindbach, whose case we commented on some weeks ago, convinced himself that he was right in poisoning such of his parishioners as were afflicted with incurable diseases, seems not to have been peculiar. A man named Starr recently committed suicide in Philadelphia, leaving a note, of which this is the the concluding paragraph:

"When a man is in trouble, and sickness overbalances his comfort, and there is no sign of improvement, he ought to be under ground. P. S.—I hope and pray the Almighty God may forgive me for this. S."

Through a mistaken policy we have allowed the English to get very far ahead of us in the race for the control of ocean steam navigation. Of the thousand steamers that plough the seas in all directions, we have absolute control of only three lines, the New York and Aspinwall, the Panama and California (of which the California and Oregon may be regarded only as an extension), and the West Coast of Central America line, belonging to the Panama Railway Company. There is a New York and Havana line, which, however, has an English line as a competitor. The English, on the other hand, have a great line connecting all the islands of the West Indies and the Antilles, and communicating with Mexico, the east coast of Central America, New Granada, Venezuela, and the Guianas. They have another grand steamship organization, covering the entire west coast of South America, from Panama to Valparaiso, and doing the freight and passenger business for Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and Chile. This West Coast of South America line, is probably one of the most profitable in the world, its dividends (it is said) reaching fifty per cent per annum. It was originated by an American, Mr. Wheelwright, who, however, failed to get support in New York, and was obliged to carry his enterprise to London.

We had a Liverpool, and a Havre line, once upon a time, but what with the illiberality of Government and the civil war, they have disappeared, and the communication between the United States and Europe is now exclusively in English steamers.

To go to Brazil we have hitherto been obliged to go first to England, and embark from Southampton for Rio. This, we are happy to see, is to be changed. The government has awarded a contract to the New York and Brazil Steamship Company, which binds itself to perform twelve trips annually between New York and Rio Janeiro, in Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, in the West Indies; Bahia and Pernambuco, in Brazil. The first trip will be made on the 29th inst. The contract is for ten years, and the company is to receive an annual compensation of $300,000, one-half of which will be paid by the United States Government, and one-half by the Government of Brazil. The vessels are required, by the terms of contract, to be first-class American sea-going steamships, of not less than 2,000 tons each, and of sufficient number to perform twelve round trips per year.

A similar contract has been made for a line of steamers between San Francisco and China, and it appears that our merchants and the Government are both waking up to the importance of retaining in our hands some part of the steam carrying trade of the world.

The Report of the Commissioners of the Central Park for 1864–5, is a most interesting and satisfactory document. No less than 20,658 trees and shrubs have been planted in the grounds during the year. The number of visitors were 2,295,199 pedestrians, and 100,397 equestrians. The number of carriages entering during the year was 1,148,161. The number of arrests for the year was only 130, of which the greater part was for fast driving. For good order, beauty, and in respect of its general appreciation, the Central Park is first in the world. When its trees are more fully grown, all rivals will sink into insignificance.

The Boston Society of Natural History offers the following prizes:—1. Sixty dollars for the best Memoir on "The Evidences of the Co-existence of man and extinct animals, with the view of determining the limits of his antiquity." 2. Fifty dollars for the best Essay on "The fertilization of Plants by the agency of Insects, in reference both to cases where this agency is absolutely necessary, and where it is only accessory."

Lieut. A. W. Hahn, who was sent through the north-eastern portion of North Carolina on special duty, asserts that "the people refuse to recognize the freedom of the blacks, who are whipped and tortured in the most fiendish manner for even expressing a desire to be free, and that shooting and killing these creatures appears to be the order of the day."

Origin of the Term Filibuster.—The word filibuster comes from the fly-boat, or (Spanish) flibote, after certain rapid sailers of 100 tons burden, built on the river Vly, in Holland. These Vly-boats were bought up by pirates, and used in the West Indies for buccaneer purposes. So every pirate became at last known as Vly-buster or Filibuster. The word was Anglicised in New Orleans about 20 years ago, and first employed to designate the annexation efforts of Austin, Bowie, and Houston in Northern Mexico.—New York World.

There is an equally plausible derivation of the term filibuster, namely, that it is only a Gallicism for freebooter. A Frenchman undertaking to pronounce the English word would come as near filibuster as anything else. The most curious definition of the term, however, is to be found in "Feyjoo's Relacion Descriptiva de la Provincia de Truxillo, en Peru," published in 1763, in which we find it stated, "El Vulgo los llamó Filibustiers, ignorante de su origin, como quien dice, gente venida de Finibus Terrae." The pirates accordingly were finibus-terraes corrupted into filibusters. This is, perhaps, as good an etymological derivation as any other, and is classical withal.

NEW BOOKS.

The Atlantic Monthly, for September, offers a variety of interesting articles, contributed by Professor Lowell, Mrs. Stowe, Gail Hamilton, Parsons, Ik Marvel and other popular writers. Ticknor's other monthly, Our Young Folks, is also an excellent number, and adapted for old folks as well as young. We take this opportunity to mention that Ticknor & Fields have established a New York headquarters at 823 Broadway, under the superintendence of Mr. B. H. Ticknor.

TOWN GOSSIP.

The chief topic of the week is that which comes home to every one, the murders by the railroad directors, for the evidence extracted from the unwilling officials on the recent inquests, established beyond all peradventure the atrocious fact, that the slaughters lately perpetrated on the various lines, more especially those on the Jamaica line and the Housatonic, were the result of deliberate carelessness in one case, and by a murderous and miserable economy in the other. We notice in the English papers that a railway official has lately been trasported to a penal colony, for an act of carelessness, which led to loss of life, the jury bringing in a verdict of manslaughter in the first degree, and we do not know any felons who deserve severer punishment than the men, who, out of a cold-blooded indifference to human life and suffering, deliberately connives at the indiscriminate mangling and massacring of their fellow-creatures. They are, indeed, the ruffians of the rail. The present number of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper contains some appalling sketches of one of the latest murders by railroad directors, for le those men, made heartless by the Moloch of Mammon, the crime is really chargeable, and until they are made to feel personally the effects, these slaughters will continue to render railroad traveling the most horrible, although the shortest "cut" to death. The New York Herald, of the 31st of August, contained a list of these atrocities, from which it appears that since the 1st of January 266 persons have been killed outright, and 1,109 maimed for life! being the result of 128 accidents. This does not include steamboat accidents, which, if added to these, would make traveling by steam a very dangerous affair. When it is remembered that every one of these accidents—as they are called—have been proved to be caused by the culpable carelessness of the officials, the bare fact that no person has been punished for these 268 murders, reads like a ghastly sarcasm on American justice.

To turn to pleasanter themes. The world of fashion is rapidly returning to its usual permanent homes. Never have hotel-keepers had a more successful campaign—if there is a scarcity of gold there have been plenty of greenbacks, and mirth has been lord of the ascendant. Men of business have come back with renewed determination to attend to their business till next summer, and the female portion of their families are already preparing for their winter campaign of operas, balls, and routes. Flirtations are ripening into honeymoons, just as blossoms turn into fruit, and the beautiful beings who have not made hay while the sun of the summer shone, intend to achieve their object under the gaslight. Next to death, Cupid knocks at every human heart, and there are very few who refuse to open its portals despite the warning of Graybeard's experience, with his disciples, old maids and bachelor's.

Coincident with the return of the fashionables to their city homes, is that of the scholars to the haunts of learning. School teachers once more resume their delightful task of teaching the young ideas how to shoot, while the owners of the young ideas once more prepare to climb the difficult steps of knowledge. When education becomes a little better understood, school teachers will not consider they have perfectly fulfilled their duty, till they have made moral discipline a portion of their study. Children are now-a-days taught to reverence Lindley Murray, but not their parents, saying nothing of their elders. If obedience were taught as earnestly as grammar, we should have happier homes, and, consequently, fewer crimes. How little the young regard the counsels of their seniors, all know. Young America seems to have pushed old America from the helm, and hence the melancholy and startling spectacle of Junior Ketchum, ruining parents, who have for 40 years stood beacons of commercial honesty and solvency.

Barnum's American Museum, destroyed in the conflagration of July 13th, is to re-open on Sept. 6th, at Nos. 539 and 541 Broadway, with accommodations lecture-room, and curiosities new throughout. Mr. Barnum's undiscouraged energy and enterprise deserves entire success, and will doubtless have it.

Despite the warm outgush of weather the theatres have been well patronized.

EPITOME OF THE WEEK.

Domestic.—In response to the complaint of soldiers who now demand that they be mustered out because they enlisted for three years or during the war, Major-Gen. Terry, commanding the Department of Virginia, defines the term "during the war" to mean "as long as any military necessity exists in the late insurrectionary States."

—— The Union State Convention of Pennsylvania passed the following resolutions: "That the mild and generous method of reconstruction offered by the President to the people lately in rebellion, in the judgment of this Convention, has not been accepted in the spirit of honest loyalty and gratitude; but with such evidence of defiance and hostility as to impel us to the conviction that they cannot safely be entrusted with the political rights which they forfeited by their treason until they have proven their acceptance of the results of the war, by co-operation in constitutional provisions, and giving to all men within their borders their unalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, having conquered the rebellious States, they should be held in subjection, and the treatment they are to receive, and the laws which are to govern them, should be referred to the law-making power of the nation, to which it legitimately belongs."

—— The Italian Opera season, under Maretzek, at the New York Academy of Music, will begin September 25, and the opening opera will probably be Petrella's "Ione," with Bossissio—the belle of 20 summers—and Mazzoleni in the cast.

—— Col. Basil Duke, the brother-in-law and chief lieutenant of Gen. John Morgan, and Col. Breckinridge, have returned to Kentucky from the South, and formed a business partnership for the arranging and collection of Southern debts.

—— Moses Thomas, of Philadelphia, has just died, at the age of 79 years. He formerly published the Analectic Magazine, of which Irving was at one time editor. It is said that he was the originator of trade sales of books. He and his sons have, as auctioneers, long held the trade sales in Philadelphia. Irving and Gen. Scott were his intimate friends.

—— A New Orleans correspondent says the property of John Slidell, comprising 842 lots and squares of ground, with stores, dwelling-houses and a banking-house, was sold for $100,410. Before the war it was estimated at $800,000. Had the war not taken place, it is estimated that Mr. Slidell would have been worth $2,000,000.

—— The ram Albemarle, which was sunk by Lieut. Cushing, near Plymouth, N. C., has been placed in the dry dock at the Gosport Navy Yard, and will be thoroughly repaired and fitted for service.

—— To avoid the exposure and identity of person, the female bathers of Newport have introduced the fashion of wearing masks in the water. These are made of thin, white cotton cloth, fitting tightly to the face, with places cut for the mouth and eyes. The disguise is perfect.

—— The current receipts of the Government from customs and internal revenue are unusually large. The income from the internal revenue averages over $2,000,000 a day. The customs revenue, through the single port of New York, is up to a daily average of nearly $600,000 in coin; August 30, it reached $735,500, or, on the basis of gold at 145, equal to $1,066,475 in currency.

—— The idea has been seized upon by a speculative house of business to have handkerchiefs marked with photographs of the owner. The process "will wash." The idea might be extended upon the knob of an umbrella; it would carry conviction at once, and be patent circumstantial evidence against the purloiner.

—— The Southerners affirm that the blacks are organizing insurrections, but the truth appears to be this—that a few blacks have signified their intention not to be re-enslaved.

—— It appears that the polite term in New York for Young Ketchum's robberies is "abstraction." We fear that the lovers of abstract science are increasing in number, says the Providence Journal.

—— Four hundred and ninety-five thousand five hundred and ninety-two persons in New York—nearly half a million—live in tenement houses and cellars. There are fifteen thousand three hundred and nine tenement houses in the city—houses, that is to say, in which more than three families live; and the average number of families to each of these is seven and one-sixth. This includes families in tenement-houses who, within the limited space they occupy, take in boarders or lodgers. There is a story of an inspector, who found four families living in one room, chalk lines being drawn across in such a manner as to mark out a quarter of the floor for each family. "How do you get along here?" inquired the inspector. "Very well, sir," was the reply; "only the man in the farther corner keeps boarders."

—— Gov. Andrew, of Mass., it is said, has consented to accept the Presidency of Antioch College, on condition that the endowment which it lately received shall be increased to $150,000. The college has now a property of $250,000, inclusive of grounds and buildings, but even this is not considered sufficiently ample to meet its real wants.

—— Major-General De Trobriand, who originally left this city as the colonel of the celebrated French regiment known as the Lafayette Guard, and who has since, by his constant and distinguished services in the field, been raised to the rank of Major-General, has, it is understood, kept a diary of all the incidents of the war that fell under his personal observation. As he served in the Army of the Potomac from the beginning to the end of its campaigns, from Bull Run to Five Forks, never having been absent but a single time, his record of the past four years must prove one of the most interesting and important contributions to history that has been made.

—— The Mississippi Convention has solicited the President, by memorial, to withdraw all colored soldiers from Mississippi; and Gov. Pierpont, of Virginia, has recommended that the same course be taken in regard to that State. It is easy to foresee that the South generally will call for the same action.

—— A Newport correspondent says: "If you have a handsome wardrobe there is every opportunity for display. You can make five changes a day and not astonish the multitude who go to the Ocean House for the purpose of being astonished at nothing."

—— The Presbyterian preachers of St. Louis have resolved not to take the convention oath, and have issued an address to their brethren throughout the State. Gov. Fletcher says they shall not preach unless they qualify. The Governor has temporal power, and will probably come out ahead.

—— Major Heman A. Fay died at Bennington, Aug. 20th, in the 87th year of his age. His father, Dr. Jonas Fay, was Secretary of the Council of Safety, and author of the Declaration of Independence of Vermont, one of the delegates to procure the admission of Vermont to the Union, and a prominent man in the early history of the State. Major Fay graduated at West Point in 1810, and was connected with the United States army for 36 years.

—— In the great international cricket match at Toronto, Canada, the boys from the United States have come off with victory. The contest was very close, and highly exciting.

—— A letter received at Washington, by a prominent gentleman of the army, from an American officer attached to the personal staff of President Juarez, dated Chihuahua, July 20, says: "No fears need be entertained of the eventual success of the liberal cause in this country. Already we have enlisted and mustered in an army of between 6,000 and 7,000 Americans, every man of whom has seen service in the Union or rebel armies during the late rebellion. To be sure, there is more or less difference of opinion among them as to the character of the cause in which they have recently been engaged, but the fact is patent that they are united on the enforcement of the Monroe doctrine on the American continent, and on that platform they cordially fraternize. The French are rapidly exhausting themselves by forced marches and futile expeditions into the interior, while our armies as a general thing are recruiting, preparatory to a vigorous offensive fall campaign. We hope to be able, and will do it, if large reinforcements are not received by the imperialists from France, to drive the French to their ships before the 1st of January next."

—— It is estimated that through the havoc and repudiation consequent upon the rebellion and its failure, and from the emancipation of the slaves, the value of property in South Carolina, which was $400,000,000 in 1860, has been reduced to $50,000,000 at the present time.

—— A 10 years contract has been agreed upon by the Postmaster-General with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for carrying the mails between San Francisco and Hong-Kong, China, touching at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, and Kanagawa, Japan. Four first-class steamships are to be employed in the service, to commence running not later than the first of January, 1867, and for monthly trips out and back the company is to receive from government $500,000 per year. The distance between San Francisco and Hong-Kong is a little over 7,000 miles.

—— The Augusta, Ga., Chronicle and Sentinel inflicts upon the Copperheads this "most unkindest cut of all." "We caution the people of the South against placing any reliance upon the copperhead faction of the North. True, this class will talk smoothly, and promise everything, as they did in days gone by. But when it comes to acts and the fulfillment of pledges, they are utterly powerless. Before the late struggle the South was led to believe that great things in her favor could be accomplished by them. What was the result? These men, who had for years used Southern influence for their own benefit, were unable to keep even a single declaration they had made—much less to render the assistance they had so pompously boasted they would give."

—— Wm. P. Johnson, of Brazoria county, Texas, has recently been in Washington, on a visit to his brother, the President of the United States, whom he had previously seen only once—at their mother's deathbed—since 1839. William is four years older than the President, being 65 years of age; is a carpenter by trade, and uncompromisingly opposed to slavery, but does not believe in giving the negroes the ballot. On this latter question he says: "Andrew would not give me any definite information" as to what he intended to do. William was a strong opponent of secession, and two of his sons were soldiers in the national army.

—— Seven hundred and fifty thousand meals have been furnished to soldiers passing through Philadelphia. This has been done by the liberality of citizens and devoted and efficient committees, without aid from city, State, or Federal Government. Here is a glorious story of patriotism and philanthropy, of public generosity and individual diligence, almost unprecedented, which tells itself in a bare statement of facts with a power and significance no rhetoric could increase.

—— In summerizing a communication to the Medical Times and Gazette, on the important subject of cholera, Dr. John Chapman, among other conclusions, holds that "the primary cause of cholera is, as a general rule, the excessive heat of hot climates, and of temperate climates in summer when cholera prevails;" that "the proximate cause of cholera is of precisely the same nature as that of summer, or choleraic diarrhœa, but that it is far more developed, and consequently that its action is proportionately more powerful and intense;" that "cholera is neither contagious nor infectious in any sense whatsoever, except through the depressing influence of fear;" and "that cholera may be completely averted, and when developed, cured by the persistent application of the spinal ice-bag along the whole spine, so long as any symptom of the disease continues."

—— The Washington Chronicle publishes the particulars of a horrid outrage upon a freedman, named Griffin, by a rebel surgeon, named Williams. It appears that the surgeon, in his rage, deliberately cut off the feet of his victim at the ankle joints, and threw them away. The poor man is now in Washington, a living victim of this unparalleled crime.

—— The census of Chicago, just completed, gives a population of 177,056, and the Tribune thinks that not a single individual has been overlooked by the enumerators. In 1831 Chicago contained sixty people.

—— The amount paid in St. Louis as United States income and license tax in 1864, was $757,385 71, and in 1865, $1,811,270 38, making an excess for the latter year of $1,053,884.

—— The grape crop in the vicinity of Cincinnati is reported to be very nearly a failure. The vines are generally mildewed.

Foreign.—M. Drouyn de Lhuys, the President of the Paris Cricket Club, has, upon more than one occasion, advocated warmly the introduction of the game amongst the youths of France, and it would appear that he has succeeded in bringing others round to his opinion, for it is announced that it is to be introduced into the Lycées.

—— The French Chamber of Commerce has just published the annual statistics of railways in France. According to this document it appears that 12,417 miles of railway were conceded in that country up to Jan. 1, 1865, and 8,113 miles opened for traffic. The fastest express train is that between Paris and Marseilles, which performs the distance (536 miles) at the average rate of 35·05 miles an hour.

—— The Archæological Academy of Belgium has appointed a commission to arrange an International Archæological Congress to be held at Antwerp next year.

—— The Neapolitan papers state that the excavations at Herculaneum are to be resumed by the Italian Government, and that the very interesting subterranean theatre is now lighted daily by sixty gas burners.

—— The cholera is raging at Ancona, in Italy, killing fifty or sixty a day, and is reported to have reached Marseilles. All the cities round the Mediterranean are in a fever of fear, the populace, with its usual contempt for scientific evidence, insisting that the disease is contagious. The governments, to quiet them, enforce quarantine, of course with no other effect than to inflict indefinite misery on perfectly innocent people.

—— The Paris Figaro says, in reference to the various puffs which are intended to keep Adelina Patti before the public: "Mr. Strakosch is stretching the cord, upon which he makes his sister-in-law dance, so much that it must break. We have heard it crack already."

—— Tragedy is dead, bien morte, say the Parisian critics, although faithful acolytes attempt to raise her standard anew every year. We are become too frivolous, says one, to raise ourselves to the level of sublime, and not at all, says another, if tragedy is no more in fashion it is because each epoch requires its own formula; the Versailles type for tragedies as well as for trees is no longer acceptable. Very true! people are as thoroughly tired of the artificial tragic verses of the French stage as they are of the clipped trees and quincunxes of Louis the Grand. Tragedy, if not dead in France, slumbers till a Gallic Shakspeare shall rouse her again into real life, or another Talma or Rachel galvanize her into temporary movement.

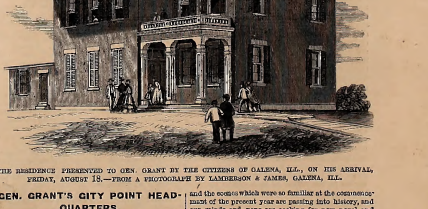
—— One of the sensation dramas played at the annual fete for the benefit of the Royal Dramatic College was called "The Piratical Pirate of the Precipitous Precipice; or, the Premeditated Prey of Proud Power, and the Prodigiously Proper Plight of the Preposterous Plunderer."

—— The Financial Committee of the French Chamber has, it is said, discovered that the Duc de Morny included his private expenses in the Budget of the Chamber.

THE RECEPTION OF GEN. GRANT AT HIS HOME, GALENA, ILL., FRIDAY, AUGUST 18, 1865.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY LAMBERSON & JAMES, GALENA, ILL.

THE LONG ISLAND RAILROAD DISASTER.

We present, in this number, an illustration of the destructive collision between the special, on Monday morning westward passenger train, and the night express eastward train, on the Long Island Railroad, between Winfield and Jamaica, a few miles east of New York city, on Monday, Aug. 28. The collision appears to have been caused by the fact that the daily eastward train was behind time, so that the special train, coming westward had the right of way, and thus proceeded as if the track were clear.



As the two trains approached, and it became obvious that a collision must take place, the engineers and firemen leaped from their places and escaped. The shock of the meeting was tremendous—the engines, both new ones, being much injured, and their running gear badly smashed. The momentum drove the passenger cars of the trains into, and upon each other with terrific violence.

It is said that the trains were so over-loaded with passengers that many were obliged to stand upon the platforms, and these of course received the worst injuries. Five persons in all died from the effects of the collision, and about 25 others were injured or wounded, a number of them severely.

The residents near the scene of the accident did all in their power to alleviate the sufferings of the wounded; and medical aid was soon at hand. A legal investigation was at once undertaken, and an unusual share of official and public interest has been shown in the occurrence. The number and fatality of recent railroad disasters is without a parallel, and the question of personal safety has become one of unprecedented and very painful interest to the traveling public.

GENERAL GRANT AT HOME.

On the 18th ult., General Grant, for the first time since the war, returned to his home in Galena, Illinois. His reception was most enthusiastic, the citizens turning out in a body to greet the hero. Flags were flying, cannon booming, bands of music playing, and triumphal arches spanned the streets—all showing the high esteem in which the general is held by his neighbors, and their appreciation of his military career. Soon after the reception ceremonies transpired, a beautiful residence, purchased by subscription, was presented to the general, with an appropriate address. The house is a substantial brick structure, built in simple style on an eminence, overlooking the river, about one-eighth of a mile from the town. Soon after the surrender of Vicksburg, General Grant said to a civilian, who was complimenting him on his success, that his ambition was to be elected Mayor of Galena, that he might build the sidewalks of its city. On his reception home he was pleasantly reminded of this remark, by an inscription being called to a brusque inscription on one of the arches—"General, the sidewalk is built."

THE RESIDENCE PRESENTED TO GEN. GRANT BY THE CITIZENS OF GALENA, ILL., ON HIS ARRIVAL, FRIDAY, AUGUST 18.—FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY LAMBERSON & JAMES, GALENA, ILL.

GEN. GRANT'S CITY POINT HEAD-QUARTERS.

The house used by Gen. Grant as his head-quarters at City Point, Va., at the time when the country was so anxiously looking for a "forward movement," has been presented to the city of Philadelphia by Mr. Geo. H. Stuart, President of the Christian Commission, and by the corporate authorities has been placed in Fairmount Park. The building is an exceedingly plain one-story structure, which would hardly be noticeable, were it not for the fact that within its walls military plans were conceived which astonished the world.

THE OLD HEADQUARTERS OF GEN. GRANT, REMOVED FROM CITY POINT, VA., TO FAIRMOUNT PARK, PHILADELPHIA.

GOVERNMENT VESSELS AT THE PHILADELPHIA NAVY-YARD.

It can be safely asserted that in no country in the world can be seen such a vast array of war vessels, as now lie peacefully slumbering on the bosom of the Delaware, opposite the Navy-yard, at Philadelphia. Not less than 100 each of all kinds—gunboats, rams, blockade-runners, monitors and other ironclads, which scarcely three months since were scattered from Rio Grande to Passamaquody, are now listlessly waiting orders from the Navy Department. Many of the vessels will probably soon go out of commission, as the Government is disposed to reduce our naval force, but the deeds of their gallant crews will long remain green in the memory of a grateful country. The war is over, and the scenes which were so familiar at the commencement of the present year are gazing into history, and our minds and pens are seeking for new, novel and more peaceful excitement.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN VIRGINIA.—The author of the law establishing religious freedom in Virginia was Thomas Jefferson. When he entered the Legislature of that State in October, 1776, he brought in four bills that he considered of vital importance; one for a general revision of the laws of that commonwealth; one for cutting off entails, to prevent the accumulation and perpetuation of wealth in select families; one for the abolition of the law of primogeniture, which made one member of a family rich and all the rest poor; and another, which he esteemed the most important of all, the restoration of the rights of conscience, which relieved people from taxation for the support of a religion they did not profess, for the establishment was truly the religion of the rich. This latter was the bill for establishing religious freedom, and was one of the three great acts of his life that he wished to have inscribed on his monument, as appears by the following well-known epitaph, written by himself:

FRIGHTFUL TORNADO ON THE LINE OF THE MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD, ON SUNDAY, AUGUST 27.

THE ONE DARLING.

BY R. V. R.

Grandmamma sat in the quaint old porch,
The little one sat near her,
Duly waiting for chapter and psalm,
With the bright little face demure and calm,
And reverent aspect to hear her.

Grandmamma sat in her elbow-chair,
With the good book open before her,
Her hands were folded as if for prayer,
But her eyes were fixed with an absent air,
A reverie had stolen over her.

It was not on psalms or on proverbs wise,
Nor on grand prophetic thunders,
Nor yet on the Gospel's gentle words,
Nor where St. John's eagle-pen records
The Apocalyptic wonders.

Yet the page was sacred on which she gazed,
And raised her thoughts to heaven,
In faded ink was written there,
The names of the sons and daughters fair,
That the Lord to her had given.

Six lonely names 'neath the head of "Births;"
But, alas! on the opposite column,
With fresher ink, but with trembling pen,
Each lonely name was written again,
'Neath "Deaths" heading, sad and solemn.

One by one of the Bible names,
Grandmamma told them over,
While the tears were filling her dim old eyes.
A thanksgiving mingled with her sighs
For the darling yet left to love her.

Reuben! my harvest and eldest born,
Who first taught me a mother's pleasure;
The first to come and the last to go,
A parent's joys twice to you I owe,
For you left me my one sole treasure.

Miriam and Ruth! it is twenty years
Since that Spring, when the Lord hereft me,
And the two little graves on the churchyard hill
We planted with daisies and violets—but still
One little Spring blossom is left me.

Samuel! like Samuel's mother of old,
I vowed him to serve his Maker,
And in taking him, God took but his own,
I dared not murmur—now one alone
Is left—may the Lord not take her.

Peter! not on the green hill-side,
Where the others are quietly sleeping,
But where coral grows, far beneath the whirl
Of the surging waves—but one precious pearl
Is left to comfort my weeping.

Esther! she was just sixteen,
Graceful, and tall, and slender,
My darling has just her soft brown hair,
And her pensive face so sweet and fair,
And her spirit meek and tender.

Grandmamma wakes from her reverie,
And wiped away the water
That was flowing over her wrinkled cheeks,
And then read the darling the chapter that speaks
Of Jairus' little daughter.

The Galley Slave of Toulon.

From the French.

BY J. G. RAYMOND.

CHAPTER I.

FRONTING the harbor of Toulon, on the western slope of that ridge of mountains which connects the peak of Condon to the valley of Ollonles, may be seen, upon the descending table-lands, the snuggest little country-houses in all Provence. They all have the same view, the sea, the roadstead and the vessels forming an ever changing and agreeable prospect. During the fair weather the families of these little villas assemble in the evening upon the terrace, and make up for the oppressive heat of the day by enjoying the cool fresh air, which ascends from the sea at the approach of night.

On the eve of St. John's day, 18—, the moon had just risen over Condon's gray peak, when the calm, country silence was broken by the booming of cannon, its echoes flying away among the distant hills. An electric movement of terror succeeded the echoes, and trembled the slumbers of many on that shortest and most beautiful of summer nights.

ALBERT'S ENCOUNTER WITH CARDEN.

Everywhere on the terraces, where young and old were assembled, was heard the exclamation:

"A convict has escaped!"

It seemed, then, that each isolated family feared to see spring in among them some tiger in human form, escaped from the menagerie of the prison at Toulon.

If any one could have followed the long train of terror, which ran from face to face among the various groups, he might have remarked, perhaps, with some surprise, the serenity of one single family, seated under an arbor, between the roadstead and mountain of Six Fours. This security of so few a number, amidst such general terror, was, however, easy to explain.

Madame de Mellan and her daughter Anna had arrived but a few days previous at Toulon, from New York, to attend to important family business. They had taken a pretty little cottage, about equidistant from the sea and the highway. An old manservant and a couple of creole waiting-maids were seated upon the terrace with two ladies when the report of the cannon was heard. As no one could give the strangers an explanation of this alarm signal, they regarded it as a very common occurrence in a fortified city, and did not even discontinue their conversation.

Blind fate—or rather the intelligent director of fatality, left the escaped galley slave in the direction of Madame de Mellan's cottage. He was a man who has left a name illustrious in the pandemonium of crime—the notorious Cardan, branded and condemned to the galleys for bigamy and forgery. He had taken two months to saw the chain which bound him to his comrade; and one day, while the latter was sleeping in the sun, in the shipyard of Mourillan, Cardan broke the last link of his chain and escaped. The convict's escape was not discovered till night-fall.

This celebrated criminal was then thirty years old, four of which he had passed in prison. His tall and well-proportioned figure, his gentlemanly manners, his pale face, all indicated a man who had moved in good society before the red jacket, which levels all distinctions, had concealed the man of society under the garb of the convict.

On that night Cardan wore nothing but his coarse prisoner's shirt and trousers; he had thrown away his jacket. Agile and vigorous as he was, his nervous legs rather resembled the bounds of a panther than the hurried gait of a man. Having reached the large trees surrounding Madame de Mollan's house, he reconnoitred the premises with that subtle instinct which nature has only given to the wild beast, and climbing like a cat up the grape-vine trellis, at the back of the house, he entered the room on the first story, which in less than five minutes he had examined to everything, seen everything, even in the dark, as if he were lighted by the clearest, absolutest eyes.

The convict found a few piles of cotton in a writing-desk, and hastily enclosed them in the first piece of paper that came to his hand. He was satisfied with this little sum, sufficient for his most urgent needs, and with one bound he leaped from the window to the freshly-mulched ground of the garden.

By early dawn he had reached the volcanic peak of Grimm, whence molten lava seems to mingle with the clouds. There he bought a shepherd's coat-of clothing, and a few sheep, and, crook in hand, descended by the narrow sheep-paths into the plains of Bouvet.

Knowing that a great road always leads to a great city, Cardan followed that long, dusty highway, which leads from St. Anne's Gate to the Esplanade of Cayce, and on the road laughed and joked with the gendarmes, who were escorting convicts to the galleys, and had just left; associated with the sailors on leave, the soldiers from Africa, the peripatetic merchants and land-organists; and, with all that strange medley of pedestrians peopling the route from London to Marseilles.

Abandoning his group, he entered Marseilles under cover of the night, and took lodgings in a low tavern in the Rue de Balgoon, on obscure portion of the city.

Unrolling his money by the light of a candle, he discovered that he had wrapped his notes around it, and he commenced to read them, for want of any other occupation. This reading, though occasional and unlikely, soon opened the muscles of Cardan's face to contract and assume a singular expression. He rose, his head bent forward, his fist edged like a bandit, who, used to all crimes, discovers, by a subtle inspiration, the means of committing a new one. Meditation, too, have immediate illuminations, and from their ever-active brain comes forth an infernal plan, armed at its birth with every victorious weapon.

Those two letters were very long; one was dated from the Isle of Bourbon, the other from the Cape of Good Hope. Among them would still be found much space, o'ver which analysis of their contents will suffice:

Madame de Mollan, but eighteen months a widow, had left New York, where her husband had, and returned to France, after an absence of nearly twenty years. To visit her native country, however, was not the object of this journey. M. de Mollan, before dying, as he indeed had lived, left no fortune to his friend; M. de Kerbriant, a gentleman ruined by the Revolution, and who had emigrated. He de Kerbriant had an only son, named Albert. This young man, having nothing to hope from the inheritance of an impoverished family, had early evinced himself to a naval career, but, unfortunately, he had not that robust health so necessary to a sea-faring life. At Bourbon, on his deathbed, made a clause in his will, which provided for the marriage of his daughter with the son of his benefactor, on such generous conditions that the debt of his gratitude was amply acquitted. The widow, Madame de Mollan, thus submitted to the last wishes of her husband, she commenced a correspondence with Albert de Kerbriant, and although twenty months had elapsed, of complying with the before-mentioned clause in the will of Anne's father. It was agreed that the packet-boat mail of Toulon in the month of July, when Albert de Kerbriant was expected to return from Pondicherry in a vessel of which that the nephew of the young officer and Anna should take place without delay. Madame de Mollan had arrived the first at this rendezvous across the ocean.

A little note attached to one of these letters announced the arrival of Monsieur de Kerbriant. This note, however, was not in the handwriting of his son Albert, but bore the post-mark of Nantes.

After a long meditation, Cardan comprehended one of those extravagant ideas, which only the genius of evil can carry out by the aid of its infernal combinations. As a preparatory step, he commenced changing his ragged garments for new and better ones, which, evidently, however, was not that too quick a metamorphosis might create the suspicions of his landlord; but removing them piece by piece, lest his new costume should excite in it detail. Then he removed to a respectable quarter, previously taking care to disguise not only the color of his hair—a sandy brown—but also his complexion, figure, gait and voice.

Being now certain of concealing the blood-hounds of justice, he set about to find a companion worthy of him, in one of those dens redolent of brandy and tobacco-smoke, which great cities, in their shame, conceal in their vilest streets.

Lavater and Gall were mere children in physiognomy when compared to a convict escaped from Toulon. To recognize his comrades, the latter is endowed with a sixth sense—that of smelling crime. In one of those remote Cardan observed a young man of from twenty-five to thirty years of age, with a pale, nervous face, and dull green eyes, showing in the nonchalance of his postures, all the symptoms of a horror of work; and in his looks, reflections of the lowest passions. The dress of this creature still exhibited under its dilapidated condition, a former competency which his laziness had dissipated; each article of his costume had figured under the yard-stick of a fashionable tailor many years back. But what, above all, betrayed his loathsome poverty and incurable laziness, was a coarse, greasy cravat, loosely twisted about his neck, and arranged in front in the vain attempt to conceal the want of a shirt.

Cardan soon got acquainted with this man through the medium of a bottle of cognac, discovered in his new friend an organization too indolent on for crime, and which could only commit a petty theft, through the impulse of some more commanding power. However, the skillful convict devoted several days to sounding this man before raising him to the dignity of an accomplice; and, when he was sure of having gained his confidence, made a gift of a few five-franc pieces—he unfolded his plans to him. From that moment age of these wretches was a blind slave to the other a servitude.

To carry out his plans Cardan required a larger sum of money than that which he had stolen from Madame de Mollan's secrétaire, especially as that was now nearly all spent. This object was easily accomplished. The commissioners of Marseilles are not so careful as their brethren in Paris; their double Napoleons and Napoleon pistoles, are not stamped with the fresh mark of the hand of any sinful conjuror who may take a fancy to them. Cardan, who could have no necessary make his fingers invisible, when changing two Louis d'or at one of these moneychangers, counted out the gold-pieces to Cardan with all the skill of a professed wizard, or an Indian juggler. With this metallic reinforcement he left this dangerous city.

The name of Cardan's accomplice was Valentine Prophore. When he was appointed Cardan's valet de chambre he only retained his Christian name; Cardan himself had become M. Albert de Kerbriant. Provided with the necessary letters of directions from his master, Prophore's part of the business was rather a ticklish one. He had to act as the quality-agent advanced money for Madame de Mollan's country-house, and skillfully reconnoitre, before the commencement of the drama, as yet without a dangerous plot. Prophore was dressed as the confidential servant of a wealthy family, set out for Bordeaux, carrying in their trunks a best and was rowed down in front of Madame de Mollan's residence, a little before sunset. He played his part admirably. He informed the two ladies that M. Albert de Kerbriant had arrived at Nantes in a man-of-war from the Cape of Good Hope; that the English blockade naval service had compelled him to give in his resignation sooner than he might have wished, and that he was coming to Bordeaux, where he could, free from all naval service, and resolved to make by his residence wherever the ladies de Mollan might choose.

During the interview Prophore stood near the foyer of the window, in the shade of the lace, the slightest shade of suspicion should appear upon the ladies' faces. This precaution was useless. Madame de Mollan, a widow of forty-five years of woman, who had passed the greater part of her life on her husband's estate in Martinique, was not one to know the ways of the world; so she placed implicit faith in all the information given her by this herald of the young lover, and in the ecstacy of joy tenderly kissed her daughter, who was already troubled at the thought of so protracted a separation.

The next afternoon at three o'clock, a loud noise of wheels, and the sharp cracking of a whip, both announced the arrival of a post-chaise in the carriage-road leading to the house.

"It is my master," Prophore said, and he ran to receive the two ladies.

A young man dressed in black, and of the most fashionable appearance, alighted from the hired carriage to the terrace, and, as if suffocated by sobs of joy, convulsively pressed his lips to Madame de Mollan's hand. Anne was so overwhelmingly disguised, that for a moment Prophore was quite alarmed at the young gentleman's error. The escaped convict bowed low before Madame Anna, and repeated the speech to her, prepared during the long journey from the Cape of Good Hope:

"Mademoiselle, I respect the memory of your father—of that generous man who has chosen me for his son-in-law, but I am not worthy to you, in my own behalf, that though I have journeyed around the world, you are the only lady I have seen whom I would have chosen for my wife."

These words were followed by that long silence which always succeeds a declaration of love, when they had devoted a reasonable share of mute sorrow to and remembrances, the conversation immediately became slightly trifling. Prophore, and afterwards at the dinner-table, Cardan manifested exquisite tact in the estimation of the ladies, by speaking of everything like but his marriage. He related in detail the voyages he had pursued during long before he left the new world, interspersing his recital with all the technical sea-terms he had been able to find in books lending to his narrative. Finally he assumed a melancholy posture and tone, and said:

"I have traveled fifteen thousand miles; I have visited the four corners of the globe; I have seen the people of all nations; and I am convinced, by experience, that a journey is never a happy one, that happiness, if it exists anywhere, is to be found only in the exercise of domestic duties, remote from the world, in the midst of family, consisting of relatives and friends."

Madame de Mollan warmly clasped Cardan's hand in hers, and for three days passed all the joy she felt at hearing such fine sentiments in the mouth of her future son-in-law.

By a skillfully-managed change in the conversation, Cardan brought his future mother-in-law to take a step very important for his safety. He hatched up a story of a pretended difficulty he had at Nantes, with some young officer, his old schoolmate, and who reproached him for what they styled his discretion, in terms sufficiently warm to provoke an affair of honor.

"I do not fear an encounter of this kind," he added; "what is well-known; but still it is unpleasant to cross swords with old friends, and I would repeat my explanation with such injustice. I prefer to give them time to reflect upon their actions. When the admiral, who is a warm friend of mine, returns to France, he will plead my cause more effectually than I could. So I have resolved not to show myself at Bordeaux, at Toulon, and thus avoid an encounter of which the consequences might be both serious and deplorable. If up another occasion, then we will take a little trip into the interior, or through Spain or Italy, as she chooses; and when we return to France, my concluct will already here been justified by my comrade's arrival from India, and my unjust friends will be ready to offer me their apologies."

All this was said in such an easy, natural tone, that it would have deceived the most sagacious persons. The tender-hearted Madame de Mollan was so charmed, especially for her daughter, at the plan of these journeys, that she was the first to propose abandoning a city where her son-in-law was in danger of encountering an enemy, and filling the widow and orphan dual. Even the secluded position of her residence was not a sufficient guarantee against her maternal anxiety, since the neighboring houses were occupied by officers' families, who constantly exchanged visits during the evenings of the fair season.

Cardan manifested no desire to immediately depart from Toulon; but this well-assumed calmness was only a mask to deceive the fond Madame de Mollan, who thought herself obliged to use strategy in persuading her future son-in-law to leave the city without delay; then, taking Cardan aside, she said, pointing to Anna:

"That poor child is very timid; she hardly dares to speak to me of her fears. To remove this timidity, you must travel some time together. Suppose you accompany me to Nice like a journey; you will be like old friends in less than a month. You and I are independent of the whole world, are we not? Then, I shall have proof of your love, and Nice as well as in France. So let us commence by putting our minds at ease, and departing immediately."

Cardan bowed with an air of resignation, and said,

"I do not wish to refuse my mother-in-law the first service she requires of me. I am ready to go."

In the arrangements of the departure,—which were made between Cardan and the good widow,—as soon as Cardan informed Prophore, the pretended valet, should follow them with the baggage in a few days, during which time he was to dispose of the domestic effects left incomplete, a certain sum of money being left him to provide for the expenses of his undertaking.

The next day, before entering, Madame de Mollan, her daughter, and the galley-slave, set out in the carriage for Nice. In the city Cardan procured passports for Spain, and, a few days afterwards, arrived with the two ladies, his victims, at the Hotel de Europe, in Perpignan.

The simals of crime offered few instances of a story where the incredible plays a greater part. However, these events were not extraordinary they would not be related here.

CHAPTER II.

Two weeks after the departure of Madame de Mollan, young Albert de Kerbriant landed on the pier of Marseilles. He was just stepping to change his traveling clothes, he hastened to enquire the whereabouts of Madame de Mollan. At the custom-house he met a clerk in pursuit of him, and jumping upon the nearest post-horse, outstripped the officer, after a short gallop, arrived at the cottage.

The young officer started at the sight of this Italian trollop, through whose leaves he perceived the waving hair and white muslin dresses of a bevy of fair ladies. There was his future wife,—his betrothed—his fortune. He threw himself from his horse at the end of the garden walk, and reaching the terrace in great agitation, pronounced the beloved name, and announced his own. A group of young persons rose silently at the appearance of the young man in blue, and the latter astonished looks were directed upon the new-comer, who was unknown to them all.

Wondering at this reception, Albert thought he had mistaken the house. "Pardon me, ladies," he said, "I perceive that I am a mistake in the house; it is not astonishing—the houses here are so much alike; and yet I was directed very accurately."

A middle-aged lady replied to the young officer:

"Perhaps you are not mistaken, monsieur. We have only lived in this house since last week. Madame de Mollan resided here before we came, at least so the villegers told us, and no doubt they will point out her house."

"Has Madame de Mollan returned to the city then?" asked the young man, agitated by some unaccountable presentiment.

"No, monsieur. She left here in a post-chaise, accompanied by her daughter and son-in-law."

"Her son-in-law!" exclaimed Albert.

"Yes, her son-in-law; or, at least, the young gentleman who is to marry her daughter."

Albert had recourse to all his moral courage to aid him in concealing his emotions before these strangers, and succeeded in calm voice, face and manner, and said:

"Excuse me, madame, if I enter into details which may seem out of place. One question more, if you please. Do you know the name of this son-in-law—this young man—who is to marry Mademoiselle Anne de Mollan?"

"Oh, yes, the same is well-known here; the servants tell all the farmers' wives about here. Mademoiselle Anna is to be married to M. Albert de Kerbriant."

"Yes, yes, I know that!" said the real Albert.

"You see, monsieur, that we are well-informed. By this time the marriage must have taken place."

"With M. de Kerbriant?" exclaimed the young man in a hollow voice, which startled all the witnesses of this scene.

All bowed their heads in the affirmative.

"With M. de Kerbriant!" repeated the unhappy Albert, in accents of despair. "But it is impossible; I am Albert de Kerbriant, and I have come here to marry Anne de Mollan! This is an infernal mystery. Some scoundrel has intercepted my letters and stolen my name. What a horrible revelation!"

And he seated himself disconsolately on a bench, wiping the cold sweat from his forehead.

But the excitement of his anger soon caused him to stand proudly erect again; he saw that all his happiness and his long cherished hopes were necessary to him in discovering and punishing an infamous act, unparalleled in the annals of crime. He took leave of the ladies, overwhelming self for having thrown in upon their seclusion, and tractered to acquire such information from the neighboring farmers. When he was certain of the hour, the day, and the direction in which the ladies and Cardan had departed, he lost not a moment in following the traces of the ravisher.

At Marseilles he went to all the best hotels in search of the fugitives. At the latter establishment he gave at the Hotel de Europe, the intelligent and obliging landlord immediately recognized the travelers in question. He told de Kerbriant that the three persons of whom he was in search had spent two days in the house, and that they had embarked for Rosolens. The landlord even gave the name of the hawker to whom he had taken Cardan to procure a letter of credit on fifteen thousand francs for his mother-in-law, for whom he exercised the power of attorney. Not only did Albert find the landlord's information correct, but at the banker's he recognized his own signature, counterfeited with consummate talent that betrayed the deed of a guilty forger.

This discovery was as a flash of lightning to the young man. He took a post-chaise, paid the driver double fare, and urged him never to relax speed in less than five hours was at Toulon, elevated with the Governor and Mr. Prizan, who informed him of the escape of Cardan the bigamist and forger, and gave an exact description of his person. That night young officer started for Rosolens, provided with additional important instructions, and with a letter for the French consul. This horrible journey of a day and a half, followed with all possible speed, a minute lost might cause an irreparable wrong. As soon as de Kerbriant reached Rosolens he hastened to the consul's. He was at the Italian Opera House. Two minutes after leaving the consulate the young officer and the consul were both immediately shown to the consul's box. Entering, he apologized for his inopportune arrival, and presented his letter of introduction, which he explained all.

The consul requested young de Kerbriant to retire with him to the back part of the box, where they could converse without being seen or overheard. During the conversation Albert received the following alarming intelligence:

"A stranger of an uncertain age," said the consul, "came to my house about three weeks ago, and introduced himself as M. Albert de Kerbriant. He said that he intended traveling through Spain, in company with his future mother-in-law, and his betrothed wife. At the near approaching termination of his mourning for his lately deceased father, he was to be married. The real Albert appeared strange to me; it was a mingling of striking resemblance and contrast with vulgar habits and occasional low expressions. His pretences were of an assumed case, betrayed by his frequent oversights of the part he had upon me, he said, in the first place, to pay his respects, and secondly, to consult me upon the forms to be used for a marriage with a foreign country, upon which subject I gave him all the information he could furnish. Since then I have seen him but twice, one of those occasions being to-night. He occupies a box nearly opposite to me, with the two ladies of his pretended union you have pointed out. This is strikingly exact, with this difference, however, that his lady is black and luxurious instead of being light and short; but this, no doubt, is merely the work of a barber."

The consul and de Kerbriant now took their seats in front of the box, and the former directed the other's attention to the box which had been pointed out, provided visitors. At the first look Albert understood the man's character; for the galley-slave, unconscious of the scrutinizing gaze which was turned upon him, reclined a sullen immobility, evincing none of the enthusiasm of the audience, who were then warmly applauding an Italian duo.

Dressed in black, his face overspread with that pallor produced by the long stage of confinement of the galley-slave; his eyes fixed, his head bent down, and mouth dilated, Cardan seemed like a permanent statue, disengaged from all trifling preoccupations, while meditating upon some scheme whispered to him from hell.

Beside him appeared a contrast—loomed in her unaffected joyousness the young and beautiful Anna de Mollan. Albert de Kerbriant rose at the first entre acte, and casting the consul with the familiar gesture which signifies, "I will be back in a moment," walked towards the box of the escaped forger. The consul followed Albert at a little distance. The young man gave three light knocks at the door; it opened, and in a calm, distinct voice he pronounced the name, "M. Albert de Kerbriant!"

Cardan arose, not without betraying some agitation, and went out into the lobby.

"Am I now addressing Albert de Kerbriant?" asked the young officer.

"Certainly, monsieur," replied the convict, in a voice harsh, with sudden emotion.

"Are you quite sure of that?"

"That is a very singular question," said Cardan, with a forced smile.

"Not so singular as you may imagine," said de Kerbriant, and quick as thought snatched off Cardan's false locks, and the short, cropped hair of the galley-slave was exposed to view.

"You are a convict from the prison of Toulon!" exclaimed Albert, in a voice of thunder.

Cardan uttered a low, deep growl, and drawing a poignard, was about to rid himself of the troublesome stranger before the scene should have other witnesses, when Albert, who had foreseen this act, adroitly seized the convict by the right arm and throat, and pinned him against the wall of the lobby, calling loudly for help.

At his cries the frightened inmates poured out from the neighboring boxes; and a moment later, Cardan, who still retained hold of his poignard, was arrested by the officers of the police; and Albert, clinging with almost superhuman strength to the collare of coat and shirt of the convict, tore both by the same effort, and laid bare Cardan's shoulders, where, upon a skin browned in the sun of Toulon, were branded two ignominious letters. A murmur of horror rose on all sides; but Albert did not stop to explain the story—he had a more pressing duty to perform.

Madame de Mellan and her daughter listened uneasily to the alarming noises which came from the corridors; but they dared not leave their seats. Suddenly the French consul, followed by a stranger in the uniform of the French navy, entered the box and said to them:

"Ladies, please accept our arms, and accompany us to my house, which is always at the disposal of the loyal subjects of France."

Madame de Mellan and her daughter, bewildered by all these mysterious events, did not hesitate to accept the consul's invitation. The widow took Albert's arm, and Anna the consul's.

By the light of the chandeliers, which brightly illuminated the vestibule of the theatre, they easily distinguished, as if in broad daylight, a pale and nearly bald-headed man, with naked shoulders, vainly struggling with the police, amid the scoffs and jeers of the excited throng.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Madame de Mellan, "it is Albert!"

"No, madame," said the consul, "that man is not Albert de Kerbriant, but a scheming villain, who has contrived, and nearly executed, a horrible plot against your daughter and yourself. He is an escaped convict from the galley of Toulon, and is branded on the shoulder with the letters T. F.,* as you may see, if the crowd will allow us to get near enough."

Madame de Mellan was so overcome that her speech failed her—she could make no reply.

At the consul's residence were exchanged the explanations and surprises destined to bring this history to its natural and legitimate denouement. All the privileges usurped by the galley-slave were restored to the real Albert de Kerbriant.

The emotion consequent upon this eventful night did not permit the ladies to receive Albert as he deserved to be; but the next day Madame de Mellan and her daughter had not thanks enough to bestow upon their young and handsome liberator; and that very day, at the consul's dinner-table, it was arranged that the marriage of Anna and Albert should take place at the church of St. Louis, in Toulon, and that the admiral should be requested to sign the contract.

THE FORGOTTEN STRAIN.

BY A. W. B.

HEREAFTER—when the purple dawn
Has paled before the climbing sun;
When meteor dreams have flashed and gone
And hopes have faded, one by one;
When all the tender flowers of Spring
Have drooped and fallen in their pride,
And sweetest birds of brightest wing
Have wasted all their songs and died—
Thy voice will float across my brain
Like some long-lost, forgotten strain.

When shadows lengthen—when the noon
Of life has passed to sure decline,
And I must feel it—ah, too soon!
But only age and death are mine:
When all the sands that falsely burned,
As gold along the shining shore,
Have lost their brightness and returned,
With shame, to common dust once more—
The song will find my heart again
Like some once-prized, forgotten strain

KENNEBEC river, in Maine, is without a rival in New England, either for its historic associations or the beauty of its natural scenery. It rises among the passes of the highlands that form the northeast boundary line between the United States and Canada, and after flowing through a romantic region for many miles, enters a valley of surpassing beauty, through which it meanders between level intervals of the richest verdure.

There is a fort near the mouth of the river called Fort Hunnewell. It is now a ruin, and is a celebrated resort of the people in summer. It was erected during the last war to defend the entrance to the river. It is situated upon a low beach, which is commanded on the north by a bold headland, a hundred feet high, on which frowns the ruins of a battery.

At the time of our story, which was near the close of the war, two British armed vessels had been cruising off the mouth of the river some days, occasionally running close in with the fort so as to draw their fire. They were effectually blockading the entrance to the river, and for some time no vessel had gone out or come in. Everything was brought to, even to the small fishing boat, and the strictest vigilance was maintained from the first day of their arrival.

One morning in June, just as the sun was rising from the sea, throwing its fiery spears far across the sparkling waves, lighting up every object upon which it lit, the English cruisers were standing in towards the mouth of the river, under top-gallant sails, with the wind free on the larboard quarter. They were half-a-mile apart, their course converging to a point. This point was a sloop hugging the land, and endeavoring to make the entrance to the river. Her broad mainsail was flung to the wind like a great white wing, and she was sweeping across the water like a gull flying before a storm. She had been discovered by the cruisers only a few minutes before, when they tacked together and pressed after her to intercept her, making sail as they went. Fifteen minutes more of the obscurity of the morning, and the adventurous sloop would have got into the river and under the guns of the fort unseen, or seen too late to be cut off.

It was a beautiful sight to behold the three vessels in motion; one, small, unarmed, with but three sails to help her along in her flight, bounding along close under the shore; the others tall, frowning with batteries and covered with canvas from deck to truck. The sloop was a mile in shore of the cruisers, and about three miles westward from the mouth of the river, being, when discovered, just stealing round Cape Small Point.

The cruisers stood on for about ten minutes after tacking in the same converging lines, when the corvette signalized the brig, which immediately luffed and bore up four points eastward, while the former kept her first course. The object had in view by this manœuvre of the brig, it was plainly evident to the fishermen, who, from the rocks upon which their huts were perched, were watching with interest the pursuing and pursued, was to intercept her, for they had quickly discovered that a direct chase would be useless, as the sloop showed herself to be a very fast sailor. So the brig stood straight towards the river mouth, hoping to reach it in advance of the sloop, while the other kept on to capture her if she should turn back and attempt to run into Haspwell or Portland.

"We shall be tuk, darned if we ain't, cap'n," coolly remarked a tall, ungainly youth of eighteen, who, with a dipper fastened to a ten foot handle, was bailing up water from the sea and throwing it on the mainsail of the sloop, to swell the threads of the canvas and make it better hold the wind. As he spoke he paused in his work and leaned upon his long dipper handle, and shutting one eye, he took a deliberate survey of the cruisers.

"Not so long as two timbers of the Sally hold together, 'Siah," responded the captain, who grasped the helm, and with one eye ahead and the other watching the enemy, directed the course of his little vessel towards the shelter he sought. "If we'd only had another twenty minutes afore sun-up we'd a got in. But the day ain't agoin' to stop for any man, and I don't expect it tu. All we must do is to keep the Sally out of the hands of the Britishers, now they've got their eyes on us. Wet the sails, 'Siah! keep wettin' 'em."

"I guess they kind o' guess what we've got on board, captain," said 'Siah, as he cast a shower of spray over the mainsail. "They seem to take all-fired trouble to catch us. See how Sally jumps! The way she tosses the water with her bows, I won't have to wet her jib, she does that herself!"

"If we don't get into the river, and them chaps overhaul us, what is to be done?" asked Mr. Bissell.

"It won't do to let them capture them six big guns, and two barrels of powder, and ton o' shot, that we've got for the fort, that's a fact, 'Siah," said very decidedly, captain, or rather Deacon Samuel Butters, who owned or commanded the Sally, which had been engaged, a few days before, by the Government agent in Boston, to convey armaments and ammunition to the fort. This enterprize the deacon, for he was a lawful deacon in his own town, which was forty miles up the river, had cheerfully undertaken, assuring the agent that he could get the Sally into the river safely, in spite of the cruisers. Shrewd, bold and cool, the deacon saw that by running only in the night and hugging the shore, he could probably get into the river undiscovered, especially as the cruisers used to stand off from the shore at night, a mile or two for an offing, and run in again at sunrise. The agent felt that a small coasting vessel, with so watchful a captain as Deacon Butters, would be quite as likely to get into the river as a large one, if not more so, and gave him the commission. For the sum of three hundred dollars the deacon had bargained to take the munitions to the fort, and also bound himself if there was any danger of being captured to scuttle the sloop and sink her.

The cannon were battery thirty-twos, six in number, and were laid athwart ship, side by side, upon deck. The shot were piled forward, and in the forecastle was stored the powder in casks, and securely protected under canvas; tarpaulins also covered the guns.

"If we can only stand on ten minutes more, 'Siah," said the deacon to his mate, "I don't fear them two cruisers a stick! One of them, you see, has luffed to try and cut us off. If 'twant for this plaugy heavy iron we've got in her, I'd show the enemy how to make a keel cut blue water through! But we must get in, Lot," he added, turning to a ragged old man, who looked like a weather-beaten fisherman, who comprised all his crew, and who was now engaged in tending the main-sheet, the slack of which he held in his iron fist.

"It's got in safely, deacon," answered Lot Bissel, gruffly, "and get three hundred dollars, or sink the sloop, and no insurance!"

"That's a fact, Mr. Bissel, responded the Yankee skipper with emphasis; and shifting his tobacco from his larboard to his starboard cheek he glanced under the mainboom to see how the fort and shore lay, and then hove his eyes to the windward, and took a deliberate inspection of the enemy. "Give a small pull aft on the main-sheet, Mr. Bissell. 'Siah, haul aft the jib a bit! The Britisher is smoking his pipe," added the skipper, quietly, as he saw a jet of smoke belch forth from the bow of the corvette. He had hardly got the words out of his mouth when the boom of a gun reached his ears, and simultaneously a shot passed whizzing over their heads.

"I don't stan' that are!" said 'Siah, in a determined tone, which singularly contrasted with his awkward, rustic exterior. "Give me leave, deacon, and I'll give 'em a shot back, darn me if I don't!"

"Your gun won't scare 'em, 'Siah. Ease off the main-sheet, Lot. Be ready to dodge, for I guess there'll be another one o' them junks of iron this way. They ain't no pilot or they wouldn't keep so near a porpoise rock ledge."

Cool and steady the skipper stood at his post and directed the course of his little craft. All at once he gave a loud hurrah! The corvette had struck upon a rock barely below water, under full sail, known as Porpoise Ledge, and everything was taken aback, while her main-royal mast went over the side.

"That's for not taking a pilot on a strange coast," said the skipper, dryly, while his keen little eyes fairly glittered with pleasure; but he made no further demonstrations of joy; but after taking a second glance at the vessel, and seeing that matters on board of her were in too much confusion for them to trouble themselves further about him, he now gave his whole attention to the brig, which was about a mile from him in a straight line, and about equal distance from the entrance of the river.

Upon seeing the accident that had happened to her consort, she bore down a little and hoisted a signal. It was responded to on board the corvette, when the brig resumed her course.

"The corvette, I suppose, says she don't want any aid, so the brig is left at liberty to intercept us," said the skipper. "It looks, too, as if she would be likely to get to the entrance as soon as the Sally, and then I guess it is all up with us! But I don't give up so long as a timber hangs to her, or I can have a limb to hang on to the tiller by! But what in natur' are you doing there, Josiah?"

Well might the deacon ask this question. The ambitious young man had brought from the forecastle a keg of powder, and knocked the head in with a handspike, and was now tying about half a peck of it up in a handkerchief which he had taken from his neck.

"Doin'! I'm goin' to give 'em a gun, darned if I ain't! If these here guns have got to go to Davy's locker, I'll have one fire out of 'em first, I guess," replied Josiah.

As 'Siah spoke, he threw down a moveable section of the bulwarks amidships, leaving an open space to the sea before the muzzles of three of the enormous cannon that lay across the deck. He then took up his huge cartridge, and thrusting it into the muzzle of one of them, began to ram it down with a handspike.

"What on airth is the critter at?" cried the deacon.

'Siah made no reply, but having rammed the cartridge home, he rolled a thirty-two pound shot towards it, and giving it a lift, shoved it into the muzzle after the powder.

"Now for primin' her, and then if I don't give 'em a Fourth of July salute, they never heerd one!"

As he spoke, he poured a handful of powder into the vent, and then jumping to the calaboose, he lighted a pine-knot, and waving it to keep it bright, approached the gun.

"Stop, 'Siah, stop!" shouted the skipper, at the top of his voice; "you'll blow the Sally to Jericho, if you fire that 'are gun aboard on her!"

"I don't calculate I'll be tuck pris'ner by the Britishers, deacon, and be put in Dartmore, I guess. I don't mean to fire jist yet, but take a good chance for good aim, and then give them saltpeter!"

"It'll shake every bone out of the Sally," said the deacon, in alarm.

As he spoke, the brig fired a shot across her bows.

"That means heave-to, Lot," said the skipper. "'Siah, put out the pine-knot."

"I mean to by'm'by, deacon. Wait till I get a shot at 'em! I ain't afeared o' hurtin' the Sally a bit! You jist yaw her a little bit, and bring the muzzle of my artillery piece right agin the brig, and if I don't show them how a Yankee can speak, I don't want to see 'tother side of old Kennebec river agin!"

A second gun came from the brig, and the shot passed within ten feet of the deacon's head, and made a rent a fathom long in his mainsail, and the shock caused his peak halyards to part and let the peak of his mainsail down. This caused the Sally to fall off a point or two; and while the skipper, unflinching and with a quiet look, was trying to bring her to the wind again, 'Siah, taking advantage of a moment as she swung, in which his loaded gun bore upon the brig, instantly applied the torch to the vent.

The roar, the flame and the concussion was terrible. The little vessel reeled under the recoil of the vast gun till the waves poured in over her bows and stern. The skipper and Lot were laid flat on the deck, while 'Siah found himself hanging by the heels in the lee shrouds.

For a few minutes the deacon thought his vessel would go down, she wallowed and plunged so; but she soon steadied herself, though with her decks flooded and her jibboom blown away, and with her windlass unshipped.

"I guess if they got that shot, it'll settle 'em," said 'Siah, as he dropped, feet first off the rigging, into which he had been blown, upon deck, and tried to see through the smoke.

"You ought to be settled, you 'tarnal critter!" cried the deacon, enraged; "you like to have sunk her, darn ye!"

"Don't swear, deacon. I want to see if the brig got it."

"Got it, you fool! I guess you'll get it, if I ever see shore agin!"

As the smoke slowly rolled away, the brig was discovered no longer standing down, but knocking about at the mercy of the wind and waves, her foremast gone by the board and dragging over her sides, with all its yards and sails. The shot had cut off the mast within two feet of the deck!

'Siah was perfectly confounded, but manifested no surprise, while the deacon and Lot set up a loud hurrah of triumph.

"Why, what's the matter? Why don't you hallo?" said the deacon, taking breath.

"Coz it aint nothin' mor'n I meant to do," replied 'Siah, with an inimitable sangfroid; "I aint surprised, if you be, deacon."

In twenty minutes more the sloop Sally, with her valuable cargo, was sheltered under the guns of Fort Hunnewell. The British corvette lay upon the rock till the next tide, and the brig lay by her, rigging a jurymast. Before sunset both vessels made sail, and steered eastward, on the way towards Halifax, to repair damages. The blockade was raised, greatly to the relief of the commerce of the river.

THE FORCE OF IMAGINATION.—Various cases of death produced by imagination are on record. The following is from a reliable source: Many years ago a celebrated Continental physician, author of an excellent work on the force of imagination, being desirous to add experimental to his theoretical knowledge, made application to the Minister of Justice to be allowed an opportunity of proving what he asserted by an experiment on the criminal condemned to death. The minister complied with his request, and delivered over to him an assassin, a man who had been born of distinguished parents. The physician told him that several persons who had taken an interest in the family had obtained leave of the minister that he should suffer death in some other way than on the scaffold, to avoid the disgrace of public execution, and that the easiest death he could die would be blood-letting. The criminal agreed to the proposal, and counted himself happy in being freed from the painful exposure to which he would otherwise have been subjected, and rejoiced at being thus enabled to save the feelings of his friends and family. At the appointed time the physician repaired to the prison, and the patient having been extended on a table, his eyes bound, and everything being ready, he was slightly pricked near the principal veins of the legs and arms with the point of a pin. At the four corners of the table were two little fountains filled with water, from which issued small streams, falling into basins placed there to receive them. The patient, thinking that it was his blood that trinkled into the basins, became weaker and weaker by degrees; the remarks of the medical men in attendance in reference to the quality and appearance of the blood (made with that intention) strengthened the delusion, and he spoke more and more faintly, until his voice was at length scarcely audible. The profound silence which reigned in the apartment, and the constant dropping of the fountain, had so extraordinary an effect on the brain of the poor patient, that all vital energy was soon gone, and although before a very strong man, he died without having lost a single drop of blood. Imagination has always been found a powerful agent in the production or aggravation of disease. Indeed, the fact has passed into a proverb.

IRISH PEASANTS.—On the banks of Lake Glendalough I visited a cottage of the better order, and found that it was intended as a lodging-house for such stray anglers as come to fish in the lough. The cottage contained a decent bed-room, with a wooden floor, and with two good beds for visitors. The board and lodging together amounted to £1 week. The mistress of this cottage was still a very good-looking woman, although she was forty-six years of age, and had 14 children. In the course of a short conversation with her and her husband, I became the depository of a small piece of family history, which, as it was not confided to me as a secret, I cannot refrain from recording here, as a sample of that simplicity and candor which have struck me as such conspicuous features in the Irish character. The good wife having told me that she was married at 15, I was curious to know what had led to so early an union. Without a moment's hesitation, and evidently without the consciousness of telling anything extraordinary, she gave me the following explanation in the presence of her husband. She said, being the only child, and the sole support of her mother, who was a widow, she felt that, as her mother's health was beginning to fail, she must do something more effectual for her future maintenance. Two ways were open for her—one, service with a farmer, the other matrimony; the latter being her option, through an offer made to her by her present husband, who, by-the-bye, was obviously much older than his partner. After much deliberation, she decided on marriage; "though," she added, pointing to her husband, "I did not then like him at all, at all." I, of course, rallied her good man on a confession so little flattering to him; but he confirmed its truth, adding, however, that she came soon to like him well enough—"almost as well as he liked her;" and, what seemed to him still more remarkable, "that she made as good a manager as if she had been 30 instead of 15." The good couple's married life had evidently been a happy one; and the smoothness of its current seemed to receive no ripple from the present candid recurrence to what must have been a grievance in its day.

FLIES.—A fly lays four times during the summer, each time 80 eggs, which make 320: half of these are supposed to be females, so that each of the four broods produce 40. 1. First eight, or the 40 females of the first brood, also lay four times in the course of the summer, which makes 12,800; the first eight of these, or 1,600 females, three times, 384,000; the second eight twice, 250,000; the third and fourth eight, at least once each, 256,000. 2. The second eight, or the 40 females of the second brood, lay three times, the produce of which is 9,600; one-sixth of these, or 1,600 females, three times, 384,000; the second sixth twice, 256,000; the third sixth once, 128,000. 3. The third eight, or the 40 females of the third brood, lay twice, and produce 6,400; one-fourth of these, or 1,600 females, lay twice more, 256,000. 4. The fourth eight, or 40 females of the fourth brood, once, 2,200; half these, or 1,600 females, at least once, 128,000. Total produce of a single fly in one summer, 2,080,320.

CANALS.—The first canal on record was one constructed by Ptolemy Philadelphus, for the purpose of opening a communication between the Nile and the Red Sea. The great canal of China, extending a distance of 825 miles, was commenced in the ninth century. Canals were introduced into England by the Romans, who formed one from the river Nyne, a little below Peterborough, to the river Witham, three miles south of Lincoln; and in 1134, during the reign of Henry I., a canal was made to effect a junction between the Trent and the Witham. The first canal regularly constructed with locks and sluices was made in 1563, near the city of Exeter. The aggregate length of navigable canals in England exceeds 2,200 miles.

FEW are less happy than those who have ambition without industry; who would win the prize, but will not run the race.

NAMING THE SWORD.

BY N. G. SHEPHERD.

In the land of the Moslem, afar in the East,
Where the palm and the tamarisk grow,
And the scent of the roses is scattered abroad
By the spice-winds that every where blow.
The warrior chooses a name for his sword
Which in battle he grasps with his hand,
And alone by that name which he gives to it then
The weapon is known in the land.

Al Battar, the Trenchant, and Medham, the Keen,
Monthawi, Destroyer of Life;
Dhul Fakar, the Piercer, Al Catûm, the Strong,
And Hatef, the Deadly in Strife.
Thus he christens the sword which he wears by his side,
And wields with his arm in the fight,
And the blade, as he draws it from out its broad sheath,
Flashes keen in the sun's burning light,

What name shall I give to this sword of mine,
This sword I have worn so long,
And all thro' the day on the weary march
I have listened to its song.
And at night when the welcome halt was called
On the ground beside me it lay,
As close as a bride to her husband's side,
Till the golden dawn of day.

And oft in the battle's thunder and roar,
As I stood in the skirmish line,
Like the hand of a dear friend, tried and true,
I have felt its grasp in mine;
And closer in mine I've pressed it then,
And waved it above my head,
While round about me the ground was strewn
With the wounded and the dead.

What name shall I give it, not Modham the Keen,
Nor Monthawi, Destroyer of Life,
Dhul Fakar, the Piercer, Al Catûm, the Strong,
Nor Hatof, the Deadly in Strife.
I have decked it with ribbons of red, white and blue,
The gift of three maidens all fair;
The red is from Fanny, the white is from Maud,
And the blue is from sweet cousin Clare.

High over the mantel I'll hang it, where hung
The old rusty flintlock so long,
And oft as I gaze on it, silent, I'll think
That I listen again to its song.
I'll hang it up there, now its service is done,
High over the hearth's ruddy flame,
In hopes that the Angel of Peace will draw nigh
And write on its scabbard a name.

Bound to the Wheel.

CHAPTER X.—CONTINUED.

SLEUTH was for the moment literally stupefied by this unexpected disappearance of the coat. Who had taken it? Phillis? If so, had she done it in the belief of some sinister meaning in his act in dropping it there when he saw her coming? And then, what would she do with it?

Or had she merely happened to see something lying on the stone pavement, and so picked it up? Sleuth hoped that this was the true explanation, and that it would equally apply to any other person if Phillis were not the finder. But, in any case, the incident was of the most menacing character. The finder would take it into the servants' hall, and the housekeeper, seeing it, would but too well understand the deceptive use it had been put to, and why she had been so much puzzled. And if so used, by whom but Sleuth?

What was to be done? He stood for a moment in bitter anguish of soul, repenting of his deed; and, perhaps, if repentance would in any way have promised to save him, he would have been inclined to try to put himself into a right frame of mind based on the compromise—sacrifice of future gain, condonation of the guilty past. But this was no longer a practical question. The coat was gone from under his control, and was, in all probability, being exhibited, at that very moment, in wonder among the servants.

Two or three times he moved to go, now this way, now that, in the urgency of his impulse to do something—something sudden, brilliant, effective—no less would do. But each time he stopped after a few steps, perceiving how hopeless was the task be had been about to attempt. Once a voice seemed to come to him, crying aloud, not to his ear, but to his inmost sense of being, "Fly! Fly while you can! The one deception will suggest all the rest! Your supposed intention to rob will bring out your real act of murder!"

But he could not fly—not, at least, to any useful purpose. He had no funds. Besides, flight would inevitably raise the darkest suspicions; whereas, if be safely got over the next few hours be might have before him, finally, a life of ease, wealth, dignity and triumph. And if, after all, it did now become known that he possessed and had worn such a coat, what than?

His swift thought ran over the whole ground of conceivable danger, and brought back unexpected comfort. Of course the coat was his, he should boldly say. He had hastily put it on when intending to run after the burglars—his box happened to be open: might be not say ransacked by the robbers? Well, and than he had gone through the safe-room in pursuit; had heard the housekeeper call to him and to Mr. Anthony; had even stopped to let her in, though he couldn't wait to talk; and then, when he slackened pursuit, seeing the villains were quite gone, had returned through the house, and dropped his coat somewhere by the way, he having taken it off as he got heated. What an idiot he had been to alarm himself so unnecessarily! That explanation was clear, complete, had no flaw.

Stay! The housekeeper might remember that he had said nothing of this when she mentioned these circumstances in connection with Mr. Anthony.

True, and rather awkward. But, then, he had said nothing to convict himself, while saying nothing in explanation. People would understand that he was tired just then—quite jaded and done up, and wanted his breakfast; and so be had scarcely heard—certainly didn't at all heed, the particular meaning of the housekeeper's remark.

While be thus fortified himself by the only possible modes open, he heard a ring at the gate.

"It is the lawyer," thought Sleuth to himself. "I hope he won't hear anything about this infernal coat. Fool—fool that I was, when I had it safe in my hands, after such hours of anxiety, to go and undo everything in an instant, by my absurd fear of Phillis! Better have trusted her than this. Ha! she is coming. Now, then, I may discover if she found it; but—confusion seize me for my folly!—I cannot ask for it."

"Mr. Stamp, the lawyer, has come," said Phillis, as she approached, and then she turned and went back.

There was nothing in her hand—no coat; no question, either, on her lips about it. She did not even use his name, Richard; but that might be in fear of being overheard. Could she have found the coat? No; else, whatever she might think, she must have said something to him about such an incident—unless, indeed, she attached no sort of importance to it, and had put it down somewhere as belonging, possibly, to one of the men-servants. There was fresh hope in this thought, for he might rapidly run over the neighboring rooms and passages, and possibly again repossess himself of it without a word.

Certainly, if any one could have watched Sleuth as he did this, and heard the cunning excuses he invented for being where be was when he met any one, they would have found it difficult to repress a kind of sympathy with so much ingenuity, fortitude and boldness. But be saw nothing of the coat. Strange to say, he saw no collection, either, of the servants discussing that or any other matter. They were all dispersed, each, apparently, about his or her own particular business. And yet, thought Sleuth, one of them might at this moment purposely be keeping out of his (Sleuth's) way, in order not to be spoken to on the subject till Dr. Pompese the magistrate should come, and he, the unknown possessor and accuser, then walk into the impromptu court with the damning evidence of something wrong. For, in spite of all his self-satisfying reasoning, instinct warned him that the danger he had striven so seriously to avert was hardly likely to be less a danger merely because he had no longer hope to avert it.

The alderman was avenged. The pangs of his last moment, caused by knowing he had failed to save Anthony from the operation of the codicil, and by seeing in Sleuth his murderer, were, after all, as nothing to those endured by Sleuth, as he stood in the half gloom of the stone passage, white as one who had just received the physician's first warning that death cannot be long kept off.

He wipes the cold dews from his face and hands, pushes his fingers through his hair, and, with a devotion worthy of a better cause, goes back to Anthony and to meet the lawyer, and to fight as he may the dread battle, which is no longer one for wealth alone, or even primarily, but for existence.

CHAPTER XI.—MR. STAMP.

MR. STAMP, the lawyer, a little, thin man, with a large, vigorous-looking head, and sharp, wrinkled face, seemed rather struck with the position of affairs when he found himself introduced to Anthony, and heard from him of all that had happened. But he made no comment.

So, again, when Sleuth entered, at first with a vivacious, almost gay face, which suddenly changed, even as he crossed the room, to one of melancholy protestation against all the calamities of life, Mr. Stamp appeared to look at him inquisitively, and, to Sleuth's great uneasiness, from under these black, bushy eyebrows of his, which almost met across the nose. But still Mr. Stamp said nothing from which Sleuth could draw the slightest intimation of the nature of his thoughts.

Perhaps, after all, it was only the oddity of the position of the two young men that made him turn from one to the other so often—both so uncertain as to the alderman's disposition of his property, both so friendly to each other, and both so dependent through their future lives on what was now to be made known.

Mr. Stamp looked at them as if taking a kind of intellectual measure of comparison from their persons. Anthony was much the taller of the two, and in that respect had an advantage over Sleuth. There was, also, independent of height, a certain brusque dignity and manly self-assertion which seemed to be connected with his square, broad and level shoulders, that had no counterpart in Sleuth's frame and gestures. But in nearly every other point Sleuth would, by most eyes, have been esteemed the finer man. Though slender, he was wonderfully well knit, and he moved with a certain kind of stealthy gracefulness; and his face—a hundred times handsomer than Anthony's—was smooth and bright-looking, while Anthony's was thin and slightly scarred, and, on the whole, sad. All this told greatly in favor of Sleuth with ordinary observers. But then, it must be acknowledged, Sleuth was always, except when under the influence of rare and powerful emotion, the same—pleasant at first, scarcely so pleasant at last, because unchangeable. Now, with Anthony, a sudden smile would break out at unexpected times, either called forth by a joke, a touch of wit, or some noble and kindling thought, and then the plain face would be one piece of sunshine, that you could not look on without a sense of sympathy and gladness.

Let us add, to complete this view of Anthony's personal appearance, that the first aspect he presented of personal dignity and strength was a little impaired, on closer acquaintance, by a certain tenuity of his limbs and general frame, that contrasted curiously with his striking breadth and squareness of shoulders. It was as if he had been intended to become a man of truly magnificent build, but something had failed in the process. Perhaps the cause might be found in indifferent nursing in his childhood, when the poverty of his widowed mother had compelled her to trust him to one who was little more than a child herself, while she, the poor mother, worked to maintain the three, and kept up her soul, "bating no jot of heart or hope," while thinking of the possibility that the alderman, who had begun to befriend them in little things, would, after her death, take to her boy altogether, and so it just had happened.

"Well, gentlemen, to business," said Mr. Stamp. "If you will both consent to leave to me all that pertains to the alderman's proper burial, I shall be glad to save you the painful task; and then, that settled, we may at once address ourselves to the question—How has the alderman disposed of his property? Can you tell us anything on that subject, Mr. Sleuth?"

The lawyer had been stooping, as he spoke, over a paper of memoranda on the table where he sat; but he now glanced up sideways at the gentleman addressed, and Sleuth didn't like the look of that eye.

"Didn't Anthony tell you—" began Sleuth.

Anthony was about to speak, but the lawyer just lifted his hand and stopped him. So Sleuth repeated what he had told Anthony about the codicil, and his fear that it was either no longer in existence, or had been vitiated by some new instrument.

"Pardon my frankness, young gentleman," said the lawyer, "but I can understand very well your doubts. Suppose you have one document, somebody else may have a later one, and you don't care to show your hand till——"

"I don't know, Mr. Stamp, why you should doubt my word," said Sleuth, with quickness and spirit. "What possible motive could I have for hiding it, if I had——"

A spasmodic affection of the throat caused him to suspend his sentence, but it was for a moment only, and then he finished it in the same tone as before,—"if I had anything in my favor to produce?"

"What motive could you have, did you say? No, of course not—none. Excuse the remark; but I thought, as an old professional man, it would be a pity for us to go beating about the bush if the thing we sought were in your pocket all the while."

Anthony and Sleuth both laughed at this, and the lawyer's grim face just showed that he too could laugh, without, however, compromising himself by so demonstrative a gesture.

"Well, then, where do we begin?" asked Anthony.

They began by collecting all the keys of the house, inviting each person to contribute all he or she could to the common stock. Mr. Stamp was particularly impressive about his wish to have them all before beginning. When, by a sort of exhaustive process, he had accomplished this, he began, not by opening room-doors and unlocking cupboards, &c., but by locking every place that he found unfastened, whether of room or cupboard, and desiring the servants to amuse themselves in the kitchen or garden till be called them. This inexplicable proceeding shook Sleuth's little stock of calmness; it looked so like locking up the coat, and preventing any shifting of it from place to place, rather than seeking the important paper. There had been, he thought, just time for some one to speak to the lawyer, and give a warning word. Well, he must be cool and wary. He drew a quick breath and waited.

"There, gentlemen," said Mr. Stamp, after going through every part of the house, and ransacking walls, and corners, and passages for open or concealed places of deposit, "I think we may now say that whatever papers the alderman left behind are safe from this moment, if only they have been safe up to this moment."

Is it Sleuth's fancy, or did the lawyer glance at him while saying this, just as he might have done if he had actually known of the destruction in the bed-chamber of a certain paper—the pieces of which were then undergoing the process of digestion? Connecting this with the previous remark about "motive," it was almost impossible for Sleuth to avoid the fear that the lawyer's mind was speculating dangerously upon his (Sleuth's) possible doings and character. The torture was fearful, but the smile which expressed the torture was angelical.

It was strange how that the missing coat haunted him. He had become so apprehensive of it, that his first thought at the opening of each fresh door was not about the will, which he was quite prepared for (knowing its worthlessness whenever he should be able to produce the missing codicil), but of the coat—always the coat. "Is it here?" But it was not "here," whatever the place visited: neither thrown upon a chair, hung upon a wall, nor placed for safety in any of the more important receptacles of the house, where valuable things were kept. It was an immense relief to Sleuth to discover that it was not in the housekeeper's room, nor in the bedroom occupied by the housekeeper and Phillis—unless in their own boxes—these being the only two rooms he had specially feared.

And gradually, as time passed on without fresh cause of alarm, and as the lawyer's manner insensibly grew more genial, as he found nothing to imply any confirmation of his original belief that Sleuth was secretly in possession of a document which he meant to produce when it suited him—as this happened, Sleuth himself began to take more interest in the proper object of the search. No will was found, but paper after paper was drawn forth, and from the strangest places, forming the beginnings of wills and codicils which the alderman had amused himself in writing, then hastily thrust away, just where he had happened to be, as if to prevent some one about him (possibly Sleuth) from suspecting his occupation, and then, in his gradual loss of memory, had apparently forgotten them altogether—a matter of no great importance, as they were mere fragments, mostly undated, and all unsigned.

"Warm, warm! as the boys say," ejaculated the lawyer, jocosely, as they found a paper of this stamp in the last place they had to examine in the whole house, and after some hours had been spent in the search, which thus seemed to be useless.

"How d'ye make that out!" said Anthony. "We've discovered nothing. You say all this is rubbish, and we are at the end."

Again the faintest glimmering of a smile illumined the lawyer's wrinkled face, while his eyes sparkled with a certain light, peculiar to themselves, as he looked at the two young men for a moment, as if enjoying their perplexity; then he gravely said:

"Really, gentlemen, this won't do. Either Mr. Sleuth or I must come to the rescue. Mr. Sleuth says he has nothing, and knows of nothing. You, Mr. Anthony, say ditto. What if I now search in my own pockets? Excuse the jest."

His face then, to Anthony's immense amusement, became grimmer than ever, as he took out a long folded sheet of paper from the breast of his coat, and remarked in explanation:

"I could not usefully produce this sooner, for I had reason to believe, as you may have partly seen, that it was superseded by a later document. Suppose we now collect the servants, and then have what I may now venture to call the will publicly read. It is usual to delay this proceeding to a later period, but as I happen to know that nobody is likely to complain of not being invited, we'll put aside ceremony, for the sake of giving you both prompt satisfaction; and, if necessary, we can have another and more formal reading after the funeral."

"With all my heart!" cried Anthony, wonderfully lightened in spirits; for if Sleuth was not the heir, he could hardly doubt who was.

CHAPTER XII.—READING THE WILL.

SCARCELY were the servants got together, before an interruption occurred which threatened to delay seriously the proceedings. The dining-room, in which they were assembled, had a window extending along one entire side, and from floor to ceiling, in order that a conservatory running parallel with it might almost seem a part of the room. It had been originally the drawing-room of the house: but the old man had liked so much to be there, that when he found himself confined almost to one apartment, he chose that, and there had wheeled himself about in his invalid's chair, and occasionally, with Sleuth's assistance, had traveled into, and up and down the conservatory, to see and smell the flowers.

He had also then wrought another change. Finding the solitude a little oppressive, as the wall, only a few yards distant, was so high as to shut out the view of the road—a half-private one opening from the main road—he had caused a small portion of it to be cut away, and an iron railing to be inserted, so that be could see the passers-by (who were not numerous enough to be annoying), and get pleasant glimpses beyond of the open country.

It so happened that a lady on horseback, who had apparently come with some companion to the neighborhood, for whom she waited, seeing the quiet by-road, walked her horse into it. He was a most beautiful creature, jet black, and did not apparently like the comparative inaction she forced upon him. Anthony saw her through the conservatory window, and, forgetting wills, lawyers, and dead aldermen, stepped forward to get a nearer view, evidently charmed with her graceful person, easy seat, and her self-possession, which did not, however, prevent a certain heightening of her color, as the horse stamped, and threw up his head, and did everything he could think of to obtain her consent to a fresh burst.

While she, however, restrained him with a firm but delicate hand, there passed, not far off, a pack of hounds in full cry. That was too much. He reared in the air, as if to assert himself and his rights in the face of heaven, and in spite of the beautiful tyrant on his back; then, heedless of bit and rein, flew off.

"She will be thrown!" cried Anthony, aloud. "What on earth could her father or friend be thinking of to put her on a horse like that?"

Out he ran into the conservatory, then to the door at one end, and then with a leap he cleared the iron railing, and stood outside.

He might have spared himself his trouble and alarm. Already the beautiful black rebellious creature was on his return, curvetting proudly, almost angrily, the white foam of the red nostrils conspicuous, and large, prominent, and brilliant eyes seeming to glance backwards in wonder at what sort of stuff the rider could be made to exercise such mastery.

Back they came, lady and horse—back to the very same spot from which they had started; and Anthony was about to advance, as if to help her, wondering the while how he might best introduce himself to so beautiful a woman. But she cut him short, and said, as if anticipating the movement:

"No—please don't touch him, or he'll start again."

Anthony now began to understand that she must have come with some one to his uncle's house, for he saw another horse standing in the main road near the lodge gate, held by a groom, as if waiting while a visit was being paid.

The lady saw the look—saw the face of the young man, so full of admiration, yet also of respect and embarrassment, and then apparently bethought her she ought to say something.

"My father, Dr. Pompesa, has just gone into the house. We have heard of this dreadful news. Alderman Maude and my father were friends."

"I am truly glad to hear that," said Anthony. "It is my uncle you speak of."

"Mr. Anthony Maude!" said the young lady, with some surprise, as though he had been the last person she would have expected to find in the house.

"Yes I am that unlucky person, of whom, no doubt, you have heard little good."

Miss Pompess smiled in answer to Anthony's smile, and, somehow, the two seemed to know each other well from that moment.

"But you will come in?" asked Anthony, with sudden interest and earnestness.

"No, thank you. I told my father I would wait for him here."

"Oh, pray come in. Mr. Stamp wants an audience."

"And who is Mr. Stamp?"

"The lawyer, who is to settle, in the next few minutes, what becomes of me, of cousin Dick, and of all the alderman's property. Pray come in. It must be as good as a play to all but us poor fellows, who have to hang on every word as as if it were one of life and death."

"You don't mean that it is uncertain if—if Mr. Sleuth is to be the heir!"

"Poor fellow! I'm afraid he thinks it very uncertain. I don't wish to cry before I'm out of the wood; but it does look as if Fortune were tired of persecution, and meant to make up to me for all her stepmother-like doings hitherto. Pray come in."

Clara Pompess did not look at him again, as if she felt only too conscious of the eloquent entreaties of those dark brown, brilliant eyes, which continued to hang on her every look and movement; but after a moment's pause, she said:

"If I do go in, and things are as you expect, I shall disappoint you, perhaps, and show my sympathy with the losing side."

"That's right. Upon my life, I'm half turning against myself, when I see how well my cousin bears it."

"Does he? Does he, really?" asked the young lady, with sudden vivacity. Well, then, I—" But she stopped, as if reflecting she had been about to say something that were better left unsaid.

It was but the work of two or three minutes for Anthony to help his new acquaintance to alight, take the horse to the stable, and run back in order also to lead her into the house. But she had preferred finding her own way in; so that, when Anthony returned to the dining-room, he found her there, or at least looking into it, for drawing gracefully about her the long riding-habit, she had glided into the conservatory almost unnoticed, and stood close by the open glass-door opening into the room, where she could hear all, see what she pleased, and be very little seen on account of the shelter of some of the foliage of the grape vines to which in summer time, as now, the conservatory was chiefly given up.

As soon as Anthony had satisfied himself as to her whereabouts, and had taken up a position behind the lawyer, from whence he could watch her without seeming to do so, he remembered her father, and turned to look for him.

In good time! For that portly, distinguished-looking gentleman in black, sat in a sort of post of honor at the table, the lawyer having, in consequence, taken a less imposing seat. A frown was visibly gathering on the august face at the perception of the fact that here was the alderman's nephew come into the room, without a word or sign of acknowledgment and respect for the visitor, and that visitor himself.

Instinctively Anthony sprang from his chair to his feet, and stepped forward with something very like a blush upon his cheek at the "unveracity," as Mr. Carlyle would call it, of what he was about to suggest.

"I beg pardon, I—I—have been so excited by—by recent events, I did not know what I was doing. Permit me, sir, to say I am Anthony Maude."

"And I am Dr. Pompess, young man—a friend of your ever-to-be-lamented uncle—Dr. John Pompess. You must have heard him speak of me?"

Anthony bowed, as if to say he had; but in truth, could remember nothing on the subject, the alderman not having lived long in the neighborhood, and Anthony having been seldom at home.

Seeing the young man's behavior, the doctor nodded to Mr. Stamp, as if he were now satisfied, and the business might begin. And then, while Anthony fell back to his chair, and while Sleuth affectionately stood behind him, and leaned his hand upon the rail, and stooped now and then to speak to his cousin, and so made a show of not thinking about the missing coat, and the possible duties, before the day might close, of the magistrate who sat there; and while the servants huddled themselves together on chairs in a corner near the door, with the housekeeper a little advanced, as became her place and consequence; and Phillis near to her, with firm-set lips, never once looking towards Sleuth, unless he happened on his part to look towards the beautiful young lady in the riding-habit at the conservatory door—while this was the position of the group, the lawyer began to read, in a loud, rasping voice, that never once softened or changed, whatever the sentiment expressed happened to be. To him the will for the moment was simply a will, and nothing more. If he even, as a member of the church, thought it incumbent on him mentally to protest against the heathenish omission of all reference to a Mightier Power in such a document, even that caused no outward manifestation.

The Will of Silas Maude, Alderman of London, and now of Rock House, Green Lanes, Henoston, Surrey, August 2, 1811:

I, Silas Maude, as aforesaid, being now in my seventy-first year, and in the enjoyment of reasonable health of body, and of entire soundness of mind, do hereby give and bequeath my whole property of every kind, houses, land, money in the funds, and other investments, of which a list will be found at the end of this paper, to my beloved nephew Anthony Maude. (Signed) Silas Maude. Witnessed by Anna Milton and James Branch.

The lawyer paused, glanced at the audience, and then turning the leaf, read the list of the alderman's property, from which it appeared he was worth nearly a hundred and seventy thousand pounds.

"Short and sweet, Mr. Anthony," said the learned doctor. Then he hemmed two or three times, and then said, "No codicils—no bequests to—to—friends, or dependents. Hem! very strange!"

The lawyer was now handling a letter which he had taken from his pocket, and which he turned over and over before breaking the seal, as if to try to speculate once more, and for the last time, as he had often speculated previously, on the nature of its contents.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said he, "I do not know whether there is anything in this letter seriously modifying the very important instrument we have just read, but before tendering our congratulations to our young friend, let us read it.

"The will I have read you was dated, as you see, August 2, 1811, and very soon after that time deposited in my hands—the contents, of course, being fully known to me. But more than a year after I received from the alderman this sealed letter, which was to be kept with the will, and remain unopened till that will came into operation. I know nothing whatever of its purport. It is only now I am authorized, by another letter which I have with me, to break the seal."

There was a general stir and murmur, and resettling of chairs, as the lawyer paused a moment, conscious of the dramatic nature of his position.

Clara looked towards Anthony, and seemed to wonder if it were possible that one human being could so play with the destinies of another as to raise him up to so high a pinnacle of fortune, only to throw him down again into nothingness. Anthony saw the glance, so full of womanly interest and sympathy, and smiled, and Clara forgot the very theme that had for the moment so utterly absorbed her.

Again the lawyer read:

I am about to do that which, if only proposed to me a little while ago, I should have esteemed a deadly insult. I am about to give away all I possess with one hand, and then hold out the other in appeal to the very creature of my making.

This letter may be—must be seen by many persons. I write it, however, exclusively for Anthony Maude. In what I have to say, therefore, I shall now address myself directly to him.

Anthony, I have loved you better than any other human being in the world—except one; and though you have been a troublesome fellow to me, I believe, on the whole, you have some liking for me. Do you guess that one? I never intended to speak of her to you. I should have roughly treated you if you had ventured to speak of her to me. But you never knew her. How I loved her perhaps you will some day guess, when you, like me, shall have a pretty little winning creature sitting on your knee, and teaching you—the hard, selfish man of the world, as we rich men mostly become—how to sing the songs of innocence, and forget to laugh at your own folly.

It is a wretched story, boy, so let's shorten it. When she ran away with her own groom, and married him, I said nothing, I only waited. She came; I sent her away. Then he, the pitiful, treacherous vagabond, tried his luck. I never did wish to horsewhip anybody in my life but him, and I beg to assure you, Anthony, I had that wish gratified.

Perhaps if she had been patient, and kept him from me, things in the end might have gone differently. I can't tell. Old men are obstinate. However, she didn't try in the only method that might have succeeded. She began to preach to me. Then, I confess, I forgot many things I ought to have remembered, and blazed out upon her pitilessly.

I scarcely know how now to write about it, there comes such a heat in my blood, even while I lament; yes, lament too late. I swore to her, as she stood before me, defiant, daring me to meet my Maker (so she put it) at my last day, in my then wicked state of mind—I swore to her, I say, that neither she nor her children, if she had any, should ever have a single shilling from me of all the wealth I had piled up, and piled so long and laboriously, chiefly for her sake.

We parted, mutually savage; and though, not long before her death, she came to me in a different mood, broken down by want and distress, I—I sent her away; yes, I did. God forgive me!

She died, leaving, as I have since heard, a child; whether boy or girl, I know not.

Anthony, boy, can't you guess the rest?

Will you look after that poor little miserable thing, if in truth, the child does live? I leave you all—all, Anthony. My will of August 2 I leave absolute. But what I can't do, even now, for her child—help it, educate it, provide for it—have you the manliness, the honor, the will to accomplish?

Another thing. Do you now understand why I am often so angry with you for your extravagance? We are famous self-jugglers, all of us; and I have, somehow, accommodated my mind to the notion, that I can, through you, remedy what I can't and won't remedy by breaking my oath. But how if you make ducks and drakes of all my guineas, Anthony? What then will you be able to do for the poor victim of a woman's sensual folly, and of her father's unforgiving soul? Think of it, boy, think! When I am dead, if I don't sleep in peace, let it be my own sins I suffer for, not yours.

That's all. I have taken measure of you pretty closely; and if we don't come to a violent break while I live—we are both of us hot, sudden, and a little reckless of words when passion is at white heat—if, I say, this doesn't happen, and compel me to make a change, and try your cousin Richard, then I have no fear but you will act as you ought.

God bless you. From my very grave I seem to be able to put out my hand to you, and say once more the final words—not in doubt, but in sympathy—look after the abandoned little one.

As the lawyer stopped and closed the letter, every eye was turned upon Anthony. The character of the deceased man made this appeal a most touching one to all who listened to it. It was so unexpected. How would Anthony receive it?

Clara, in her desire to hear better, unconsciously crossed the threshold, but modestly kept her face averted while intently listening. Her father drew himself up magisterially, as if, when great questions of moral trust and confidence were at issue, he must be somehow looked to as arbiter. The lawyer peered curiously from under the thick eyebrows—perhaps speculating on poor human nature—and its tendency to take the goods the gods provide without therefore liking the slight pains and penalties that might accompany them. While Sleuth, amid the chaos of ideas which oppressed him, was pondering over the questions of the "miserable brat," whom he, and not Anthony, would have to protect, as he would let them all know in good time. Mingling with this thought was the desire to study how Anthony would behave in such an emergency, so that he, Sleuth, might get the benefit of the example when he should want it by-and-bye. Yet even amid all the whirl of such thoughts, he managed to stoop down and say to his cousin, with a beautiful smile of resignation, "I was right, you see. Let me be the first to congratulate you, and say I'm very, very glad!"

Was Anthony ungrateful, both to his uncle and to Sleuth, that he answered neither the words of the one, nor the solemn written appeal from the other. The muscles of his cheek worked—there was a dimness about his eye—the fingers were clenched, and the closed hands touched each other as they met on his knees—but he looked at no one—said nothing—and did not appear even to be trying to speak.

"Well, young man," said the doctor, after a prolonged, almost painful pause, "what do you say?"

Anthony said nothing.

"Pardon me," said Mr. Stamp, as he saw, without quite understanding it, the necessity of coming to the young man's relief; "he is quite his own master, and I may say, in effect, our business is over and ended. And I beg, individually, to offer my warmest congratulations." Mr. Stamp rose from his chair as if to go and shake hands with the heir, when Anthony, at the moment hearing a ring at the gate, rose abruptly, and without saying a word, walked—and with an erect air—straight across and out of the room.

It may be imagined that this did not propitiate the feelings of those left behind. Clara looked full of distress, but tapped her pretty foot with a sort of indignant comment that might be meant either for Anthony or for those who were making so much of his behavior. The lawyer took a pinch of snuff, first on one side of his nose, then on the other, and then shook off whatever particles might still be supposed to adhere to the fingers, with the air of a man who said plainly, "Whatever I think, it isn't my business to meddle—and I shan't." But Sleuth rose with the occasion. He looked at the doctor's angry face with such a marked expression on his own of sympathy and outraged feeling, that the doctor took a second look at him in return, and then a third—and as he saw his attitude, and that prolonged look, so deferential to him—the doctor—so properly demonstrative towards his cousin, he could not but think to himself, we have not done that young man justice. If he did come out of a chemist's shop, it was still possible to have helped him to become a gentleman. But what was Sleuth's surprise when the doctor so far gave voice to his thoughts as to say aloud, "Hem! hem! I hope our deceased friend has chosen wisely. However, that is his affair."

Conceive the astonishment of the learned doctor, and of all who were waiting for an explanation of Anthony's strange conduct, when they saw him return, leading a ragged-looking vagabond boy, holding a pistol in his hand, and staring with eyes that were at once shy and bold, fired upon the people who stared so eagerly at him.

A Link.—Sages say there are links between every race of created beings. We all know the zoophytes that unite the peculiarities of flower and animal life. The bat, half mouse, half bird. The eel, at once serpent and fish. The monkey—well, we won't talk of him—the present object is to treat of one only of these marvelous anomalies—the link hitherto perhaps scarcely sufficiently recognized between fish and woman-kind—viz., the bathing women. To enter fully into the habits of this strange freak of nature, the scientific inquirer should establish his headquarters for an entire season by the sea. Say at Long Branch or Newport. There, from the 1st of May till late in October, many fine specimens may be found. What becomes of them during the other six months, whether they disappear with the pins, or migrate with the swallows, has never been satisfactorily answered. They have been seen at intervals, and solitary, as late in the year as the commencement of November. They appear then, however, to have lost much of their habitual liveliness. They move dreamily through the water. The voice, formerly so shrill and rather harsh—"apre," as the French would say—has ceased altogether; and, indeed, these belated specimens bear no more resemblance to the plump, noisy animal, in its season, than does Pepper's ghost of Hamlet's father to the stout original he represents.

Essay on Dogs.—Josh Billings favors the world with a brief essay on dogs. "Dogs in the lump," says Joshua, "are useful, but they are not always profitable. The Nufoundlin dog is useful to save children from drowning; but you have got to have a pond of water, and children running about kareless, or else the dog aint profitable. There aint nothing made boarding a Nufoundlin dog. Rat tearriers are useful to ketch rats; but the rats aint profitable after you have ketched them. The shepherd dog is useful tew drive sheep; but if you have got to go and buy a flock of sheep, and pay more than tha are wuth, jest to keep the dog buzzy, the dog aint profitable—not much. Lapdogs are very useful; but if you don't hold them in your lap awl the time they aint profitable at all. The coach dog is one ov the most useful ov dogs I know ov; but yu have got to have a coach (and that aint always pleasant), or you cant realise from the dog. Thus we see that, while dogs are generally useful, there are times when they aint generally profitable."

Giants.—Charles Bryne, or O'Brien, a celebrated Irish giant, died in June, 1783, in Cockspur street, Charing Cross, London, aged 22. His death was said to have been precipitated by excessive drinking, to which he was always addicted, but more particularly after the unfortunate loss of all his property, saved from the profits of exhibiting himself, and which he had simply vested in a single bank-note of $3,500. In his last moments he requested that his remains might be thrown into the sea, in order that his bones should be removed far beyond the reach of the surgical fraternity. In consequence of this, the body was put on board a vessel, conveyed to the Downs, and sunk in 20 fathoms water. Mr. Byrne, about the month of August, 1780, measured exactly eight feet; in stature he gained two inches after that period, and when dead his full length was eight feet four inches.

THE FEET OF CHINESE WOMEN.

We follow a fisherman and his wife, who push their way by. The lady, who is not in her première jeunesse, has large natural feet, and having tucked up her trowsers, displays a pair of calves which an Irish porter might envy. Taking advantage of their wake stiffly totters upon her small deer's feet an ordinary Chinawoman of the urban population. She has no calves whatever. The muscles of her leg were destroyed by the operation which produced that beautiful foot, and from the knee downwards, her leg is but skin and bone. Do you ask how this strange deformity is produced? Stand back out of the crowd, and I will tell you.

There are small-footed ladies at Hong Kong who gain a very fair livelihood by exhibiting their pedal extremities to sea captains and other curious Europeans at a dollar a head; but as so superficial an examination of this national peculiarity did not satisfy me, I had recourse to some of my good friends among the missionaries. By their aid I obtained that some poor Chinese women should bring me a complete gamut of little girls from the missionary schools. Many of these female children probably owed their lives to the persuasion (aided by opportune donations of rice) of my missionary friend and his lady, but their influence had been powerless to prevent the torture of their feet. On the appointed day they were all seated in a row in my friend's library, and their feet, which I suspect had undergone a preparatory washing, were unbound by their mammas. The first was a child of two years old. Her penance had just commenced. When the bandage of blue cotton was taken off, I found that the great toe had been left untouched, but the other four had been forced down under the ball of the foot, and closely bound in that position. The child, therefore, walked upon the knuckle joints of her four toes. The toes were red and inflamed, and the ligature caused evident pain. In the next three children (all of ages advancing at small intervals) the preparation was only to the same extent; it was confined to the four toes; gradually, however, these four toes, ceding to the continual pressure, lost their articulations and their identity as limbs, and became amalgamated with the sole of the foot. In the eldest of the four, the redness and inflammation had entirely disappeared, the foot was cool and painless, and appeared as though the four toes had been cut off by a knife. The foot was now somewhat the shape of a trowel.

In the fifth girl I saw the commencement of the second operation—a torture under which sickly children frequently die. The sole of the foot was now curved into the shape of a bow; the great toe and the heel being brought together as near as possible. Take a jujube and double it till two points of the lozenge nearly meet, and you will see what I mean. This is done very gradually. The bandage is never slackened—month by month it is drawn tighter—the foot inflames and swells, but the tender mamma perseveres—as the bones and tendons accommodate themselves to the position constrained by the bandage so it is drawn tighter. At last the ball of the natural foot fits into the hollow of the sole, the root of the great toe is brought into contact with the heel. The foot is a shapeless lump. The instep is where the ankle was, and all that is left to go into the slipper and to tread the ground is the ball of the great toe and the heel.

This is the small foot of the Chinese woman—a bit of toe and a bit of heel—with a mark like a cicatrice left after a huge cut, running up between them. Two of the girls were yet suffering great pain, and their feet were hot and inflamed, but in the eldest the operation was complete. She had attained to the position of a small-footed woman, and her feet were quite cool, had no corns, and were not tender to the touch. One of the mammas, influenced, perhaps, by a little liberality in the article of rice money, intrusted me with a Chinese mystère de toilette. Sometimes, it seems, when a woman is expected to have to do hard work, her toe and heel are not drawn so tightly together as to produce the true "small foot." To disguise this imperfection upon her marriage day, she has recourse to art. A piece of cork, shaped like an inverted sugar-loaf, is strapped on to her foot, and the small part goes into her slipper and passes for her foot. Thus are we poor men deceived!

THE DODO.

This is one of the birds, the last link between this and a previous ornithological era, which has disappeared within the historical period. He was first seen by the Dutch when they landed on the Isle of France, at that time uninhabited, immediately subsequent to the doubling of Cape Horn by the Portuguese. These birds were described as having no wings, but in the place of them three or four black feathers. Where the tail should be, there grew instead four or five curling plumes of a grayish color. In their stomachs they were said to have commonly a stone as big as a fist and hard as the gray Bentemer stone. The boat's crew of the Jacob Van Neck called them Walgh-vogels (surfeit birds), because they could not cook them or make them tender, or because they were able to get so many turtle-doves, which had a much more pleasant flavor, so that they took a disgust to these birds. Likewise, it is said that three or four of these birds were enough to afford a whole ship's company one full meal. Indeed, the sailors salted down some of them, and carried them on a voyage.

Many descriptions of the dodo were given by naturalists after the commencement of the 17th century; and the British Museum contains a painting said to have been copied from a living individual. Underneath the painting is a leg still finely preserved; and in respect of this leg naturalists are agreed that it cannot belong to any existing species. The dodo must have been a curious bird, if Mr. Strickland's notion of him be correct; Professor Reinhardt, of Copenhagen, holds a similar opinion. The dodo, these naturalists affirm, was a vulture-like dove—a sort of ugly giant pigeon—but with beak and claws like a vulture. He had companions or neighbors at least not dissimilar in nature. Thus a bird called the solitaire inhabited the small island of Rodrigues, 300 miles east of the Mauritius. Man has exterminated the solitaire, as well as other birds nearly allied, formerly denizens on the Isle of Bourbon.

A New Explosive Substance.—Glycerine, as we all know, is the sweet principle of oil, and is extensively used for the purpose of toilet; but it has now received an application of rather an unexpected nature. In 1847 a pupil of M. Pelouz's M. Sobrero, discovered that glycerine, when treated with nitric acid, was converted into a highly explosive substance, which he called nitro-glycerine. It is oily, heavier than water soluble in alcohol and ether, and acts so powerfully on the nervous system, that a single drop placed on the top of the tongue will cause a violent headache, which will last for several hours. This liquid seems to have been almost forgotten by chemists, and it is only now that M. Nabel, a Swedish engineer, has succeeded in applying it to a very important branch of his art—blasting. From a paper addressed by him to the Academy of Sciences, we learn that the chief advantage which this substance, composed of one part of glycerine and three of nitric acid, possesses, is that it requires a much smaller hole or chamber than gunpowder does, the strength of the latter being scarcely one-tenth of the former. Hence the miner's work, which, according to the hardness of the rock, represents from five to 20 times the price of the gunpowder used, is so short that the cost of blasting is often reduced to fifty per cent. The process is very easy: if the chamber of the mine presents fissures, it must first be lined with clay to make it water-tight; this done, the nitro glycerine is poured in and the water after it, which being the lighter liquid remains at the top. A slow match with a well-charged percussion cap at one end is then introduced into the nitro-glycerine. The mine may then be sprung by lighting the match, there being no need of tamping.

HOW THEY LIVE AT CAMP MEETINGS.—From Sketches by Mr. R. Lusk.

THE CULINARY DEPARTMENT—COOKING FOR BOARDERS.

CAMP MEETING AT SING SING.

ONE sketch of the great Methodist Camp Meeting at Sing Sing, N. Y., gives a very vivid representation of the appearance of the place and of the doings of the occasion. The ground occupied by this meeting is endorsed to Methodists by the memories of many previous camp meetings held there, so that the scene is peculiarly characteristic.

Camp meetings are an established religious institution among the Methodists of the United States, more especially in the West and South. In the north-eastern States Methodism has never been so prosperous as elsewhere; and, of course, these meetings have not been so frequent or so large. They are invariably held in some grove or open piece of forest ground, and the solemn beauty of the old woods adds a strong, though quiet reliance to the appeals of the preachers. The history of Methodism in the United States contains many interesting records of camp meetings, from the days of the good old Bishop Asbury down; and the stories of these meetings show a singular mixture of overpowering religious fervor, missionary zeal, practical common sense, shrewd and energetic management, and eccentric and humorous incident. It has often happened that bands of rustic rowdies have made organized forays upon meetings, and took so large if the amount for each attendant were considered; and there is little danger that we Americans shall spend too much money or time in worshipping the Almighty, either in camp meetings or in church.

TORNADO ON THE MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROAD.

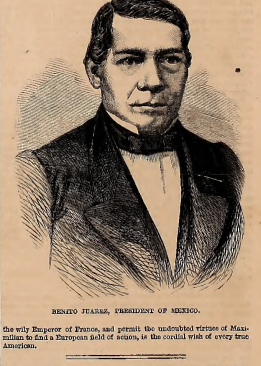
THE summer of 1865 has been memorable throughout the West for its singular and disastrous succession of heavy rains, destructive storms and fearful tornadoes. One of the most violent of these devastated a great extent of country during the night of Monday, August 21st, sweeping over an immense range of territory along the lines of several of the Western railroads, destroying several of the lives, and doing damage to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

It is reported that the growing crops have suffered severely. In some parts, large yields of corn have been destroyed totally or in part; fruit trees have been blown down or torn up by the roots, and where this has not been done the fruit has been stripped from the trees and scattered over the ground. In some wooded districts hundreds of trees have been damaged, and many of them completely destroyed; all the growing crops have suffered more or less, and many thousand dollar's worth of corn, buckwheat and other cereals have been lost.

The effects of a tornado in the forest are astonishingly wild. Great trees are broken, crushed down, bent over or twisted together, and the path of the wind is often rendered impassable by the tangled chevaux-de-frise of prostrate trunks and broken branches.

Our illustration, this week, gives a vivid representation of one of the many scenes of this kind caused by the tornado of the 21st, on the line of the Michigan Central railroad; the railroad itself, however, escaping with little or no damage, except perhaps some temporary obstruction.

GEN. JESUS GONZALES ORTEGA, PRESIDENT ELECT OF MEXICO.



GENERAL ORTEGA.

THE illustrious Mexican soldier was born in 1899 in Teul, a village of the State of Zacatecas, and in due time received the name of Jesus Gonzalez Ortega. From his earliest boyhood he was of a calm and correct nature, and studiously avoided all those exhilarating and intelligences which are generally excused under the name of youthful excesses. As a soldier he is famous for his victory over the clerical faction at Calpulpan, and for his obstinate defence of Puebla against the French invaders.

He arrived in this country last May on a diplomatic mission to the interests of our sister Republic, of which he will become President on the 1st of December next, the term of President Juarez expiring on the 30th November next. In person Gen. Ortega is very graceful, his manners are refined and courteous, and his countenance, as all can see by the portrait in our paper, handsome and intelligent. In addition to his ability as a general, he is eminent for his attainments as a scholar, and his accomplishments as a man of the world.

PRESIDENT BENITO JUAREZ.

As a companion portrait to that of Gen. Ortega we publish that of Don Benito Juarez, of Mexico, whose heroic defence against the French invaders has brought him prominently before our citizens. He was born in Tlalan, Province of Oaxca, about 45 years ago, and is of pure Indian descent, without any mixture of Spanish blood. He occupies at present the perilous honor of the Presidential chair of Mexico, which he will resign, according to the Constitution, on the 30th of November, when Gen. Ortega will assume that position. That he may finally triumph over the wily Emperor of France, and permit the undoubted virtues of Maximilian to find a European field of action, is the cordial wish of every true American.

THE GERMAN TARGET SHOOTING FESTIVAL, HELD AT BALTIMORE, MD., AUGUST 21, 22 AND 23.—FROM A SKETCH BY MR. L. EHRE.

THE GERMAN TARGET FESTIVAL IN BALTIMORE.

WHEN the German population of New York, with their numerous musical associations and their abundant resources of intellect, artistic skill and wealth, announced a cis-Atlantic German "Sengerfest," no one was surprised that their success surpassed the most sanguine prognostications; but when a single association of target riflemen, in Baltimore, attempted to make the monumental city the scene of a German shooting festival, many of the warmest sympathizers with such national jubilees could not avoid some fear of disappointment, consequently the entire success of the enterprise afforded its friends a high degree of pleasure. During the festival days—the 21st, 22d and 23d, not less than 30,000 persons of both sexes and all ages crowded the pleasure grounds, extending over an area of about 40 acres, covered by a variegated array of pavilions, huge and diminutive tents, and all kinds of arrangements for popular sports and amusements.

Although the line of city passenger cars which led to the target grounds, conveyed thousands of persons daily to and from the busy scene of the festival, still the traveling accommodations by rail were inadequate, and large numbers of hacks and vehicles of all descriptions were brought into requisition. During the trials of skill in rifle shooting over 5,000 shots were fired. The prizes distributed, and the management throughout, was entirely satisfactory to all parties concerned.

TRIUMPHAL CHARIOT USED IN THE PROCESSION AT THE SCHUTZEN FEST, BALTIMORE, MD., ON MONDAY, AUGUST 21.

A MAD BULL.

THE residents of Gotham have not unfrequently been disturbed by the mad pranks of infuriated bulls, but recently these exhibitions have become so frequent, that Metropolitans are beginning to cast a wary eye along the streets when cattle are in sight. During the month of August no less than six mad bulls careered through the city, wounding several persons and doing damage to everything destructible that came in their way. On the 31st ult., one of these maddened animals broke from a crew on Murray street, and after running over several people, knocking down awning-posts, upsetting dry goods boxes, and throwing things into confusion generally, was finally dispatched on Hubert street by a pistol shot from a policeman.

REGATTA OF THE SCHUYLKILL NAVY.

THE "Schuylkill Navy," an association of boat clubs, on Schuylkill river, which has had no general meeting since the war broke out, gave a very successful public exhibition at Philadelphia, on the 30th of Saturday, August 26th. This was a "review and regatta" of the six and four-oared gigs wals and outrigger boats of the associated clubs. The "navy" is a very popular institution, the quiet beauty and convenient location of the waters it navigates, adding unusual attractions to the pleasures of boating. The day of this ceremonial was an extremely fine one, and the slopes of Fairmount Park were crowded with ladies and gentlemen, who admired and enjoyed at once the beautiful sunset, the delightful landscapes of the place, and the skillful manœuvring of the fleet. The very interesting and well contested races which concluded the performance, derived their importance not from any question of victory or defeat, but from the pleasant evidence they afforded of renewed and healthy public interest in the manly and delightful aquatic sport of boating.

SIGNAL BOATS AT HEART'S CONTENT.

ON the 14th of August, the day on which it was thought the Great Eastern would appear off Heart's Content, Newfoundland, bearing the shores and of the Atlantic Cable, boats were sent from the surveying steamer Margaretta to signal her approach. How long and anxiously hundreds of expectant people waited for the news of the arrival of the "the big child" we have already recorded. How all was the disappointment when it was announced the Great Eastern had returned to England, and that the cable was a failure, the world knows. But all the incidents connected with the great enterprise are of interest to the public, and in deference to that interest we give a view this week of the signal boats, as they appeared, at night, in Trinity Bay, off the harbor of Heart's Content.

CHAMPAGNE.

IT is a demonstrable fact that there is more of champagne drank in the United States in a single week than is produced in France in a year. Yet Ame-sians will swear that out of the capital of the czars the Neva, you have but very little chance of ever tasting the genuine product of the champagne vineyards. In California they are quite convinced that they have the very best of undoubted Moët and Chandon; while most of us would think a man mad who could dream of questioning the fact, that the only real Veuve Clicquot is to be had at Delmonico's.

THE SHOOTING OF AN INFURIATED OX IN HUBERT STREET, NEW YORK CITY, ON THURSDAY, AUGUST 31, BY A POLICEMAN OF THE CITY HALL PRECINCT.

All cannot be right in asserting that they alone have a monopoly of the drink so much in repute, though we think there can be no doubt that the Russian has the best chance of tasting the genuine article. It is stated, on good authority, that, with the exception of what is retained by the French court for its own use, and for sending as presents to crowned heads, there is a standing agreement, that all that is left of the celebrated Clicquot vintage shall be sent to the Russian government.

How the rest of the world is supplied with its champagne, only a small portion of the world really knows. Germany supplies a large portion of what is sold as the best champagne; and Moselle wine, deprived of the peculiar flavor of the muscatel grape, from which it is made, constitutes an excellent sparkling drink, such as may very well satisfy those who have no chance of ever seeing a bottle of unimpeachable champagne decanted. But champagne may be made of almost any beverage that will ferment and effervesce, and, in fact, we rather fear it is made of any and every liquid that can be got to bubble and sparkle for the period demanded in the drinking of it. Sugar-candy, carbonate of soda, and the requisite colorings and flavorings, play their part in the sophisticating of t e desiderated drink. From gooseberry, from mangold-wurzel, and from rhubarb, good champagne may be concocted; cider, perry, mead, maple syrup, and even spruce-beer, have been used, and used largely, in the manufacture. There is no occasion for the rhubarb used in the making of champagne being fresh, for excellent judges have owned that they have been deceived with a wine of this description made from very stale rhubarb. If proper skill is displayed in the flavoring, and needful care bestowed upon the racking, we really do not see how the general public can be expected to judge accurately of what they are drinking, when connoisseurs are compelled to own that they are deceived. That tinfoil, pink tissue-paper, and neat but showy labels, have much to do in recommending champagne, is a fact the dealer knows well, if he does not acknowledge it. Let an honest man try to vend race-course champagne in ginger-beer bottles at a moderate profit on his outlay, and it is very doubtful, indeed, if he could persuade the public to give him more than the price of ginger-beer for it.

FUN FOR THE FAMILY.

DR. JOHNSON'S estimate of wines and spirits was summed up in these words: "Claret for boys, port for men, and brandy for heroes."

MRS. BOSWELL was annoyed that Mrs. Johnson had so much influence over her husband, so she said: "I have often known bears led by men, but this is the first time I ever heard of a man led by a bear."

JOSH BILLINGS, in the Troy News, gives us weekly scintillations of the ripest wisdom. The last is in the form of advice to a young lady as to how she shall receive a proposal.

"You ought te take it kind, looking down hill, with an expreshun about half tickled and half scart. After the pop iz over, if yure luvver wants tew kiss you, I don't think I would say yes or no, but let the thing kind ov take its own course. There iz one thing I have always stuck tew, and that is give me long courtships and short engagements."

"WHY do you keep yourself so distant?" said a fair one to her bashful lover.

"Because," said he, "distance lends enchantment to the view."

EDITORIAL SORROWS.—Be an editor; let the devil be waiting for copy; sit down to write an article, and get a few sentences done. Then let an acquaintance drop in and begin to tell you stories and gossips of the town; and let him sit, and sit, and SIT. This is the quickest way we can think of to go raving, distracted mad.

RULES FOR THE JOURNEY OF LIFE.—The following rules, from the papers of Dr. West, were, according to his memorandum, thrown together as general waymarks in the journey of life: Never to ridicule sacred things, or what others may esteem such, however absurd they may appear to be. Never to show levity when the people are professedly engaged in worship. Never to resent a supposed injury till I know the views and motives of the author of it; nor on any occasion to retaliate. Never to judge a person's character by external appearance. Always to take the part of an absent person who is censured in company, so far as truth and propriety will allow. Never to think the worse of another on account of his differing from me in political or religious opinions. Never to dispute if I can fairly avoid it.

Vineland Lands.

Large and thriving settlements, mild and healthful climate, 30 miles south of Philadelphia by railroad. Rich soil, which produces large crops, which can now be seen growing. Ten, twenty and thirty acre tracts from $25 to $35 per acre, payable within four years. Good business openings for manufacturers and others. Churches, schools and good society. It is now the most improving place East or West. Hundreds are selling and building. The beauty with which the place is laid out is unsurpassed. Letters answered. Papers giving full information will be sent free. Address CHAS. K. LANDIS, Vineland Post Office, Landis Township, New Jersey.

From Report of Samuel Kneeland, Agricultural Editor of the Tribune.

"It is one of the most extensive fermle tracts, in an almost level pasture and suitable condition for pleasure farming, that we know of in the Western prairies."
